Regarding the working condition of these carriages, so far as they alone were concerned, this was found to be practically perfect after they had been thoroughly cleaned and oiled. With the model 1896 carriages some little difficulty was at first experienced in causing the guns to rise from their loading to the firing position, necessitating the use of a lever to start them; but after the guns had been cleaned and oiled and counter-weight was adjusted no further trouble of any kind was had with these carriages, and I was simply delighted with the working of this model, which appeared to me to be as nearly a perfect piece of mechanism as human ingenuity could devise.

The carriages of both models were under my charge for about six weeks after they had been assembled, and during this time were operated daily, Sundays excepted. No difficulty whatever was experienced in keeping them in proper working condition, and as the carriages became more and more clean, the operations of traversing, elevating, hauling the gun down to its loading position or causing it to rise to its firing position, became more and more easy.

Regarding the graduation of the circles, I was unable to test that on the elevating circle for lack of proper facilities; that on the azimuth circle I tested with great care by means of a transit set up under the gun in its firing position with the model 1894 carriages, and upon the gun with the 1896 carriages, and found the graduation practically perfect, though the arcs of the traverse circles of the model 1896 were slightly out of their true position. * * * No difficulty was found in adjusting the index of the elevating circle. This was done by placing a steel straightedge in the bore and using the machinist level.

* * * * * * *

The gun batteries where this work was done were located on a sandy point near the water's edge. The air in that locality was constantly saturated with salt-water spray; high winds, carrying dust and sand into every crack and crevice, prevailed almost daily, and heavy rains were of frequent occurrence. The guns had no protection whatever from the weather at any time, and the batteries could not have well been more exposed to deteriorating influences. From the experience gained from caring for these guns and their carriages under such circumstances, I am perfectly confident that such carriages can be kept in perfect working condition at all times by not more than one-half an hour's work of their permanent detachments per day.

* * * * * * *

From my experience, as given above, I would therefore say that to keep the Buffington-Crozier disappearing carriages at a garrisoned post in perfect order, ready for immediate use, it would be simply necessary for a post commander to assign the batteries to particular guns, and direct the battery commanders to keep these guns in perfect order, and then make himself at least semiweekly inspections to see that his orders are being carried out. That to preserve guns at places where they are not in constant use, a detachment of about 10 men under charge of a lieutenant, or possibly a reliable noncommissioned officer, would be sufficient. With a view to ascertaining if the guns and carriages are kept in proper condition, Department inspectors of artillery should make frequent inspections and at unexpected times.

From what I have herein stated it will be seen that I regard the Buffington-Crozier disappearing carriages as perfectly serviceable, and I believe that to keep them in proper condition at all times and places it will only be necessary for the officers responsible for them to perform their duties as prescribed in the Drill Regulations for Seacoast Artillery.

Very respectfully,

ARTHUR MURRAY.

No. 3.

SAN FERNANDO DE LA UNION, Luzon, P. I., July 15, 1900.

You send me two newspaper clippings purporting to give the views on (1) the broad subject of disappearing carriages for the coast artillery, and (2) certain alleged defects in the Buffington-Crozier carriage, the only disappearing carriage adopted in our service; and because of my rather more than ordinary acquaintance with this carriage you ask for my "opinion as to whether or not it is a practicable machine, not beyond the capacity of the artillery to use and care for."

Now, I have very decided opinions as to the merits of the particular carriage in question and equally pronounced views on the general subject, provided the disparity in cost of installation of the two systems is, as a matter of fact, small, as several engineer and ordnance officers have assured me that it is. This feature, however, is a matter of simple arithmetic, and with an engineer construction report at hand could be settled, if not quieted, in a very few minutes.

It is also true that I have had not a little experience with our disappearing carriages, having mounted the first four at Fort Monroe (one 8-inch and three 10-inch), and also written a drill for these guns. Moreover, when, in March, 1898, I was detailed to duty with the Secretary of War, he immediately sent me to inspect and report upon all our modern or high-power guns and mortars on the Southern and Eastern coasts, in pursuance of which order I thoroughly inspected every such gun and mortar then installed or in process of installation from Galveston, Tex., to Portland Head, Me. (from March 26 to May 23, inclusive), and I assume that the reports of these inspections are now filed with some bureau of the War Department. I ought, therefore, to be able to give you a reasonably well-informed opinion on the question proposed, and I do so frankly and gladly.

The programme I invariably followed in inspecting these disappearing carriages is too long to incorporate here, but if you should desire it it is filed with one of my first reports, I think, submitted about the end of March, 1898. It is enough to say that it tested the system searchingly in every respect, indeed, except as to rapidity of fire. The instructions under which I made the inspections did not contemplate or permit of my actually firing the guns (this was reserved for you to do), though, of course, I have at other times frequently witnessed such firing.

To mention but a few of the points of inspection, each piece was let up into the firing position and retracted to the loading position and the times taken; the carriage traversed through its full horizontal arc and timed, and the elevating apparatus operated and timed, and mean error taken. The score or more of other "points" had to do mainly with the degree of success of the engineer work immediately affecting the carriage, the accuracy with which it had been installed or mounted, and the measure of care bestowed on carriage, piece, etc., by the artillery troop charged with such care.

These tests showed the system, as a whole, to be, in my judgment, as near perfection as could be devised. It is solid, strong, and admirably adapted to the ends in view, and bearing in mind what it accomplishes and how unerringly and even gracefully it does it, it is seen to be "a practicable machine," not only "not beyond the capacity of the artillery to use and care for," but of astonishing simplicity and at the same time of striking ingenuity.

With but two exceptions, every case observed by me of even sluggish action of the system in any direction—vertical, horizontal, or inclined, or of "stiffening of it, joints" (geared or sliding surfaces, etc.)—every such slightest inertness witnessed on the whole long tour of testing—from Texas to Maine—was with two exceptions obviously due to some fault of installation, or more often to neglect or to lack of information on the part of the artillery troops in charge. The first of the two exceptions noted was a carriage at Fort Schuyler, which, despite its being everywhere in admirable condition as to cleanliness, lubrication, etc., and properly counterpoised, would not begin the rise into battery without help, though one man with a short handspike started it with one hand, and the rest of the rise was accomplished perfectly.

This peculiar behavior was exhibited over and over again, and I afterwards heard that it was due to a fault of construction. The other exception was a carriage I saw being tested at Sandy Hook. In this the top-carriage was "cranky," would not recoil properly, but I did not, during my brief stay, learn the reason. But this carriage, remember, was under test—had not yet been issued to the service—and knowing as well as I do the thoroughness, conscientiousness, and esprit de corps, of our ordnance officers, it seems almost superfluous to add that unless the imperfection of this particular top-carriage was discovered under test and cured, then that carriage never was issued.

Your use of the word "machine" means much in this connection. Every high-power gun carriage is strictly a "machine" and needs at least a few machinists to groom it and feed it and run it. It is a dirty, greasy, vile-smelling machine (yet beautiful withal), and whether because of the dapper propensities exhibited (and to their credit) by younger officers or due to the confirmed and indurated (dried-lacquer) habits of those of us no longer young, certain it is that there is or was up to the summer of 1898 a very general reluctance (or let us say omission) on the part of artillery officers to care for their guns as these should and must be cared for—yes, even though we may actually have reverted to those early conditions mentioned by General Hunt in one of his sketches when because of his dirty mechanical calling the artilleryman had no caste among la militaire.

It would seem that the relative numbers of disappearing and barbette guns for our present armament had long since passed the stage of discussion, for was this not decided upon some years ago by the board or boards which devised and matured the plans for seacoast defense? And then, too, is it not largely a matter of site? In future allotments, apportioning the guns (barbette and disappearing) for schemes of defense not already perfected and entered upon, the one sole question in the general discussion would be that of cost.

If the disparity in cost of emplacement is really small, then, in my judgment, our disappearing system should be greatly preferred; but if the engineers' figures are largely in favor of the barbette, it might at once become a live question as to the desirability of a materially increased number of guns for the same money, even with a greater loss of men due to absence of protection, and a distinctly great loss in rapidity of fire in the individual guns, for from the very nature of the case the Buffington-Crozier system is far ahead of the barbette in rapidity of fire, since in the first the gun crouches down like a camel to receive its burden, while in the second both men and ammunition must be lifted up to the gun like climbing the ladder to the main deck of an elephant. So much for relative rapidity; as to absolute rapidity, our disappearing carriage is capable of fire abundantly rapid.

If England has discarded any disappearing carriage, it was probably the fault of the particular model tried. * * *

To resume. The Buffington-Crozier carriage is the very reverse of complexity for its purposes, being simplicity itself, and I am convinced will give a maximum of efficiency with a minimum "butcher's bill." Moreover, I believe it to be well within "the capacity of the artillery to use and care for."

W. P. DUVALL.

Mr. President, we all know what the name of Krupp means with reference to fortifications or guns for fortifications. Of course, we can not accuse Krupp of being unduly partial to any carriage. He ought not to be. His business is to muanufacture guns. Here is what Krupp says:

Yes, you may say that we have heard of the discussion in your country about disappearing carriages, and that some of your officers are dissatisfied with them and think that they are not suitable for seacoast defense. We do not share in this opinion. If there is any difficulty it must be in the construction of the carriages. It is not in the principle. We have a disappearing carriage which we think is superior to any that has ever been made, and believe that it fulfills all the requirements, especially for heavy guns.

Mr. PROCTOR. Does the Senator understand that the German Government has adopted or used that carriage?

Mr. WARREN. I do not so understand. As I remarked yesterday, the German Government is erecting its guns for very expensive emplacements, and guns erected with turret cupolas and armored machinery. Their guns and mountings cost many hundreds of thousands of dollars apiece.

It is not at all strange that Germany, slow but sure, with her seacoast all covered with a style of gun very much larger than ours, and therefore requiring a different kind of carriage, should hesitate to do away with her present armament and to adopt ours. But we find the German Government interested in it. We find the German Government complimenting us upon this carriage. We find them entirely alive and acute to the situation as to the matter of disappearing gun carriages.

Of course I do not claim that this disappearing gun carriage is the only one that may challenge the attention of Germany, but I am ready to assert that it more nearly meets the view of Germany, as they express it and as their officers express it, than does any other carriage.

Mr. President, I know the Senator from Vermont would not willingly place anything in the RECORD that is not correct, and upon one matter I am going to ask whether he is correct or not. Yesterday, in speaking of the board as constituted, he first claimed that Colonel Rodgers had been removed, but that, of course, he corrected and stated that Rodgers had not been taken off the board. He stated also that Colonel Story was taken off the board because he was against this gun carriage.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I beg pardon. I stated that he was not in favor of this gun carriage, but was still on the board.

Mr. WARREN. So far as Mr. Story is concerned he has never made any report that I know of. He has never written a letter that I know of. He has never authorized, that I know of, any expression against the disappearing carriage, and, unless the Senator has some evidence of that nature, I feel it safe to say that Colonel Story does not oppose the disappearing gun carriage, and that he has not so expressed himself.

I wish to say further that, even if there should be any intimation that Story was taken off because he was against the carriage, it seems to me the force of the argument or the assertion that the Department has been unduly anxious to use this carriage and has shaped the board accordingly falls to the gound in the light of the fact that Colonel Rogers, who has been against it, has remained upon the board and is now upon it, and when, as a matter of fact, nobody has been taken off that board who, so far as we know, is opposed to the Crozier carriage.

I do not think Colonel Story is opposed to the disappearing carriage, and I do not think he will so state to-day. If the Senator has other information I challenge and am willing it shall go into the RECORD. Certainly his removal from that board, certainly the removal from that board of General Crozier was not in the interest of shaping the board so that it would be in favor of this carriage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Will the Senator from Wyoming suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, because I hope the bill just under consideration will not take very much longer, and I want to go on with the Philippine government bill this afternoon.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not occupy much more time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Wyoming will proceed.

Mr. WARREN. There have been charges made, and oftener made outside of this Chamber than in, that the Ordnance Department is a little ring within itself; that it is illiberal as to any inventions made outside of its Department, and that the common people have been illiberally treated. Now, there are two sides to this question. If the Ordnance Department had put up money every time they were asked to develop some scheme or some patent, the country would have been bankrupt long ago.

We should have little respect indeed for an ordnance department that allowed itself to lend hand and money to every kind of a proposed invention, no matter by whom made, and I am ready to state, and to challenge contradiction of the statement, that the records of that department and the records of the Government will show that we have already authorized the building of types where the men themselves have seemed too radical for us, as business men, to believe that they were entirely right on general principles.

We have put money in oftentimes when it was more to give benefit of the doubt than that we had any confidence in the proposed invention. So I am prepared to say that I believe the Department has been as liberal in that respect as the interests of the United States and good economic government required.

Now, Mr. President, I yield the floor, as I do not wish to further exhaust the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as modified.

Mr. PERKINS. The committee has accepted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be treated as an amendment to the amendment of the committee, changing the total, which was passed over. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On the top of page 6, after the word "arsenals," strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "four hundred and six;" so as to make the total read "four hundred and six thousand dollars."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I offer an amendment and ask to have it read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, on page 1, strike out "namely" and insert:

And shall be expended under the direct supervision of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and said board shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War and subject to his supervision and control in all respects, and shall have power to provide suitable regulations for the inspection of guns and materials at all stages of manufacture to the extent necessary to protect fully the interests of the United States, and generally to provide such regulations concerning matters within said board's operations as shall be necessary to carry out to the best advantage all duties committed to its charge: Provided, That subject to the foregoing provisions the expenditure shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department having jurisdiction of the same under existing law: Provided further, That hereafter the said Board of Ordnance and Fortification shall have exclusive supervision and direct control, under the Secretary of War, of all experiments and tests, whether at the established proving grounds or elsewhere under military authority, conducted for the purpose of improving types of war material in service or for the purpose of developing or establishing new types of guns, gun mounts, small arms, ammunition, projectiles, fuses, explosives, submarine mines, torpedoes, armor plates, and all other implements and engines of war for the military service: And provided further, That hereafter only such designs of guns, gun mounts, small arms, ammunition, projectiles, fuses, explosives, submarine mines, torpedoes, armor plates, and other implements and engines of war as shall have been recommended as types by the said Board of Ordnance and Fortification shall be purchased or manufactured for use in the military service of the United States, except in such cases in which Congress by specific enactment shall have designated the particular article and type to be purchased or manufactured: And provided further, That hereafter the Board of Ordnance and Fortification shall consist of seven—the Commanding General of the Army, four Army officers, either on the active or retired list, not below the rank of brigadier general, and two civilians, one of whom shall be an expert mechanical engineer of well-known reputation.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to take any time with this amendment or to ask for a vote upon it. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senate to this matter of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification.

The first part of my amendment is a copy of the act of 1888 which established the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and apparently gave it some power. All that power has been practically taken away, and as it is now constituted it is a very useless expense and a source of controversy. I believe it would be for the interest of the country to have the board reestablished, composed of officers of high rank. In the Army bill, which we recently passed, there is a provision authorizing the Secretary to detail officers of high rank. It had better be so constituted as to have some authority and amount to something, or it should be dispensed with.

I merely offered the amendment to call attention to the matter, and I will now withdraw it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I think before going on with the unfinished business there ought to be a quorum present. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Allison,	Cullom,	Kean,	Quarles,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Kittredge,	Rawlins,
Bailey,	Dietrich,	Lodge,	Scott,
Bard,	Dillingham,	McCumber,	Simon,
Bate,	Dolliver,	McLaurin, Miss.	Spooner,
Berry,	Elkins,	Mallory,	Taliaferro,
Beveridge,	Foraker,	Martin,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Foster, La.	Mitchell,	Tillman,
Burnham,	Foster, Wash.	Nelson,	Vest,
Burton,	Frye,	Perkins,	Warren,
Carmack,	Gallinger,	Pettus,	Wellington,
Clapp,	Gamble,	Platt, Conn.	Wetmore.
Clark, Wyo.	Hale,	Platt, N. Y.
Clay,	Hansbrough,	Pritchard,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want very much to go on with the Philippine bill this afternoon; and if no Senator is ready to proceed with the debate, we can take up the amendments.

Before we proceed to do that, however, I should like to ask if some agreement can not be made in regard to the time of voting, and we can then have debate here every day. I am not unreasonable in pressing for an agreement to fix the time for a vote, but on Monday we stopped at half past 3 o'clock, after a speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], as nobody else was ready to proceed on the other side. We stopped again at half past 3 on Tuesday; and nobody was ready to proceed yesterday, when I yielded, as I was glad to do, in order that the Senate might proceed with the consideration of an appropriation bill and get that important measure out of the way.

But I do not think, Mr. President, that it is quite fair to refuse to fix a date when we can take a vote, and at the same time we find ourselves on one afternoon after another with no Senator in readiness to continue the debate. I do think if Senators want to debate this bill they ought to debate it, or else not put objection in the way of fixing a reasonable time for a vote, which will give every Senator who desires to speak a chance to speak.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I do not know what right the Senator has to say that nobody is ready to go on with the debate.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that nobody was ready to go on with it. I was speaking of the past, when nobody was ready to go on. If any Senator is ready to go on now, I shall be delighted.

Mr. CARMACK. I believe there has been but one day when no one was ready to go on.

Mr. LODGE. There was no one ready to proceed on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday. I was indulging in the hope that Senators would be willing to fix a time to take the vote. If they are not, I will ask the Senate to take up the bill after the morning hour each day and remain in session until the debate is exhausted.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. With great pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. I know the Senator from Massachusetts means to be entirely fair. We could not very well displace the conference report which was presented, and the appropriation bills which were pressing, in order to go on with the Philippine bill. The time which the Senator speaks of, unless it has been occupied in debate on the Philippine bill, has been occupied in the consideration of appropriation bills and conference reports.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator forgets. I have every day inquired if any Senator was ready to go on, and these other bills were only taken up when it was made clear that no one was ready to proceed on the Philippine bill. Besides making that public statement every day, I made private inquiries on both sides of the Chamber. I shall be glad if Senators on the other side will themselves agree to name a time when they will be ready to take a vote. It does seem as if there ought to be some time when it will be possible to conclude the debate, and I shall be glad if they will name the day.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator's attention was called the other day to the fact that this debate had been almost continuous, including Saturdays. I do not recall any time in my experience in the Senate when a bill has been kept so constantly before the Senate as this bill has been, to the exclusion of almost everything else. It has been somewhat difficult for Senators, under these circumstances, to prepare themselves. There are Senators on this side of the Chamber, at any rate, who desire to speak, and I think there are some on the other side. On account of the lull in the consideration of the Philippine bill while the appropriation bills were being considered, Senators have, I suppose, had an opportunity to prepare themselves. This is a very great question. I know how I feel about it. I would not like to stand before the Senate and the people of the United States and make a speech on a bill of this importance unless I had given some preparation to it; and I am inclined to think that the debate will proceed steadily, as it has in the past. I have not much sympathy with the disposition to force unusual hours upon the Senate, in view of the fact that every Senator recognizes that the Philippine bill has been before the Senate almost constantly.

Mr. LODGE. It had been before the Senate almost constantly for some days, and then the debate stopped and for three days no Senator has been ready to go on. Of course if I can not get a time fixed for taking the vote, I am powerless. I only ask for it because I think it is but fair that we should dispose of the bill. This is the third week of this debate—or the fourth week, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] suggests to me—certainly three weeks have been consumed in its discussion, and it seems to me it is certainly not unreasonable to ask that a time be fixed for a vote. If that is refused, under those circumstances of course I shall be obliged to keep the bill before the Senate and to ask for continuous debate upon it.

I have made these requests and these statements with a view of accommodating the Senate, not, of course, with any view of discommoding any Senator.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can hardly imagine any situation more uncomfortable than that of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He is in charge of a most important bill, which everybody understands will be fully debated, and yet he knows that there are other matters of importance that ought to receive the consideration of the Senate before we adjourn. He is naturally desirous of fixing a time when this debate shall end and a vote shall be taken on the measure. I think he has been very faithful in keeping the bill before the Senate, in pushing it, and in asking for a limitation of debate. On the other hand, I do not discern, Mr. President, any fixed purpose, or any purpose, on the other side to delay this bill for the sake of delay.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no such purpose under any contingency.

Mr. HALE. The Senators upon the other side, representing their party, feel that this is a most important measure that is to enter largely into the controversies that will arise in the coming elections, and I have felt all the while that they are entitled to ample time to present their side of the case. I do not find now that the hesitation and the unwillingness and the unreadiness to continue the debate constantly every day is entirely on the other side, but it is also upon this side. Senators upon this side who propose to speak upon this subject, and who will speak most illuminatingly, are not ready to speak to-day. I do not know that they will be ready to speak to-morrow. The Senator from Massachusetts is confronted with that situation. The Senators upon this side and upon the other side are not yet quite ready.

I believe, Mr. President—and I have some reason for stating my belief—that during the days of this week and next week the bill will be wound up, a vote will be taken upon it, and the bill will be out of the way. I do not think the Senators upon the other side will, for the sake of delay, hinder that result. I think we shall reach an agreement.

If I had my way, Mr. President, I would, either now or some days later, fix a time when the general debate, the long speeches, delightful as they are, should cease, and that we should then have two or three days for the fifteen-minute debate upon the bill or upon amendments to be proposed. Certainly nothing could give ample opportunity for debate better than that, and Senators upon the other side are as much interested as are we on this side in maintaining the dignity of the Senate and the reputation that the Senate has to-day of always passing bills that the majority desire. Nobody upon this side has been heard urging the previous question, or any measure that shall cut off debate; but we all of us have a common pride in the attitude this body presents to the country, after full debate, of coming to a conclusion and voting, and the minority assent to take their chance.

I think, Mr. President, we shall arrive at that conclusion within a few days. I look to see this bill entirely out of the way and other measures up here during some time next week, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts, who has shown great wisdom in conducting this bill, will realize that, and that we shall have that result.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the statement made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is correct, and I am very glad he has made the statement he has, that there is no disposition here to delay for mere delay's sake. No Senator on this side asks for anything but a full and fair chance for deliberation.

As I understand, there are Senators on both sides who yet desire to be heard, and the debate will go on just as rapidly as possible. Nobody has any interest in delaying the bill. Delay can be of no political advantage to either party, and neither party, I think, desires delay for mere delay's sake. There is a Senator who is now prepared to go on with the discussion, and it will go on just as rapidly as Senators can make their speeches. Sometimes it is not convenient for two or three Senators to speak upon the same day, and it is not always convenient for a Senator to commence his speech and not be able to finish it the same day. If we follow the usual course we shall have no trouble at all in coming to a final vote on this question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if there is nobody ready to go on——

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] has been waiting for half an hour to get the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall be glad to hear him. I was simply going to suggest that if there was nobody ready to proceed on the pending bill, there is another matter on the table——

Mr. LODGE. I have not been asking whether anybody is ready to proceed to-day. I now understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] is ready to proceed, and, in that case, I hope he will do so.

After what has been said, I am entirely satisfied. I merely desired to give notice—and I think I was entirely justified in doing so—that I shall ask the Senate to deal with this bill continuously until it is disposed of; and I shall move to-morrow to take it up immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, as has been very properly said, there is no disposition on this side of the Chamber to delay the discussion of this bill. When the discussion commenced it was not my intention to say anything at all in reference to the bill or to the questions which it brings up. On the 22d of February last, when the Philippine tariff bill was before the Senate, I then gave expression to my ideas with reference to the policy that had been pursued and the prospective policy in the Philippine Islands, and I contented myself with what I said on that occasion; but some things have transpired during this debate, to which I have listened with a great deal of interest, that prompt me to submit some observations to the Senate which have occurred to me during the progress of the debate, and I have waited for an opportunity, when no other Senator desired the floor, to do so.

The Secretary of War had said that it was very important that the charges which were made, and which were probably some of them true, of improper conduct on the part of some of our officers in the Philippine Islands should be thoroughly investigated. That kind of sentiment—one which I think is proper—seems to prevail with the Philippines Committee, because they very properly undertook to get before them witnesses who could give to them, and through them to the Senate, and through the Senate to the country, something of the proceedings in that distant province, which now becomes a part of the empire of this country. Because there was an effort made, especially by the minority of the Committee on the Philippines, and because the result of that effort was being presented to the Senate by the members of that committee, who were interested in developing the true condition of affairs in the Army and in the provinces of which we have taken possession; because they presented facts to the Senate and to the country just exactly as they are, the effort to defend that policy is made by Senators on the opposite side of this Chamber by charging that the Democratic minority in this body are guilty of wholesale slander of the Army. They take up, then, the gauntlet, and undertake to defend the Army against the imaginary slanders and assaults made by the minority in this Chamber.

If it is a fact that because Senators on this side are undertaking to uncover the transactions in the distant Philippine Islands to the Senate, that the Senate may intelligently act upon this question and upon this policy—the policy that has been adopted by the Administration and the policy which it is intended to follow further by this bill now before the Senate for discussion—I say if, because these Senators have undertaken to uncover what is being done with a view, if it is wrong, to putting an end to it, they are guilty of slandering the Army; and if Senators who have on this floor protested against the course that has been pursued, not by the Army of the United States, but by some of its officers and men, the regulations for whose conduct it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to make, have thereby slandered the Army, then I say the Secretary of War is equally guilty with the minority of the Philippine Committee and with the minority who have spoken on this question in the Senate.

Here is what the Secretary of War says with reference to that:

> But the fact that any such acts of cruelty and barbarity appear to have been done indicates the necessity of a most thorough, searching, and exhaustive investigation under the general charges preferred by Governor Gardener, and you will spare no effort, in the investigation already ordered under these charges, to uncover every such case which may have occurred and bring the offenders to justice.

And if the President desires to know, may not the Senate desire to know? Is it a fact that the Senate of the United States does not desire to know? Is it a fact that the only members of the Senate who desire to know are the minority of the Philippines Committee and the minority in this Chamber? But listen:

> The President desires to know in the fullest and most circumstantial manner all the facts, nothing being concealed, and no man being for any reason favored or shielded. For the very reason that the President intends to back up the Army in the heartiest fashion in every lawful and legitimate method of doing its work, he also intends to see that the most rigorous care is exercised to detect and prevent any cruelty or brutality, and that men who are guilty thereof are punished. Great as the provocation has been in dealing with foes who habitually resort to treachery, murder, and torture against our men, nothing can justify, or will be held to justify, the use of torture or inhuman conduct of any kind on the part of the American Army.
> By direction of the Secretary of War:
> H. C. CORBIN,
> Adjutant-General, Major-General, United States Army.

That is an order which was issued on the 15th of April, 1902, to General Chaffee at Manila. Mark you—

> The President intends to back up the Army.

For that very reason he desires to know the status of affairs in the Philippine Islands. The Congress of the United States is presumed to make appropriations for the support of the Army and to make rules and regulations for the Army, and for the very reason that Congress intends to make appropriations to support the Army, to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, it is important that the Congress of the United States should know and should understand exactly the status of affairs in the Philippines, just as much as it is that the President of the United States should know this status.

I repeat, that if it be true that because Senators desire to make an investigation into this matter and to ascertain the true facts in reference to affairs in the Philippines they are guilty of slandering the Army, then it must be true that the Adjutant-General and the Secretary of War, by whose order and direction the Adjutant-General made this order, and even the President himself, are guilty of slandering the Army, by directing an investigation of the status of affairs in the Philippines, in order that they may discharge the duties devolved upon them in their great offices. The truth is, no Democratic Senator has slandered the Army or charged anything that is not true against anyone in the Army, and I defy contradiction.

Now, we are met by several different propositions from Senators on the other side of this question and Senators who are supporting the policy of the Administration in the Philippine Islands. One Senator, the Senator in charge of this bill, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], tells us that we have not attacked the private soldiers in the American Army in the Philippines for the reason that the private soldiers have more votes, there being a hundred thousand of them, and that their families have more votes than have the officers and their families, and that, therefore, we have confined ourselves to an attack upon the officers of the American Army.

The junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] charged us with wholesale slander of officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates without distinction.

I find in the remarks of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] that he charges wholesale slander of the American Army by Senators on this side of the Chamber. He goes further than anybody else, and charges that we not only slander the American Army, but that we are guilty of taking sides with the Filipino insurrectionists against the American Army and virtually against the American Government. This is what the Senator from Kansas says:

> We are standing for the American soldier. You are for the insurgents.

It has been said by several Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber in this debate that no sympathy has been expressed by us on this side for the American soldier, but that all our sympathy has been expressed for the Filipino insurgents.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He has read a quotation from the speech of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] aligning the Senator's side of the Chamber with the insurgents and our side with the reverse.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to know of the honorable Senator whether he disavows championing the cause of the insurgents? Are you with them or are you not?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, as I have said, I have spoken on this question, and, in answer to the Senator, I will read what I have said on that point on February 22, 1902:

> As long as there is a fight between the United States and the Filipinos my loyalty is to the United States and my sympathies are with the Americans, regardless of causes that produced the strife. But this does not prevent my desire to get out of the strife without inflicting wrong upon friend or foe.

That is the language I used. I hope that is satisfactory to the Senator and that he regards that as an answer to his question.

It has been said that we have expressed sympathy time and again with the Filipinos, but that we have never expressed any sympathy with our soldiers. I will read again from what I said in the humble speech which I made upon the Philippine tariff.

In that speech I was discussing a Senate document, from which I will read again presently, in which the Secretary of War sent certain documents selected by him to make out the case that there were no "water cures" administered to the Filipinos in the Philippine Islands. He took up a number of cases where American soldiers were writing to their mothers or brothers or fathers or some kindred at home and where they had given accounts of transactions that were not considered by the Secretary of War, if he clearly expressed himself in the order from which I have read to General Chaffee of the 15th of April, to reflect any credit upon our Government.

In this document the Secretary of War calls attention to a number of soldiers who had explained or qualified or modified the letters which they had written home to their friends and the statements they had made in regard to the conduct of our officials in the Philippine Islands; and I noticed this, which seemed to me to be a remarkable coincidence, that in every case where the American soldier was still in the Philippine Islands or was still in the American Army and the officers could if they saw proper bring to bear upon him the power and authority which an officer in the Army can exercise over a private soldier, these modifications, qualifications, and retractions came. I say where the American soldier was still in the Army that is what occurred; but where the American soldier's term had expired and he was mustered out of the service and had returned to the United States there was not an instance found where there was any modification, qualification, or retraction of what had been said by the American soldier.

It was a singular thing to me, and in respect to that I said this:

> I do not charge any officer with obtaining those modifications and explanations by duress, but the practical unanimity with which they come from soldiers still in the service and with which they do not come from any out of the service is calculated to create a suspicion that the soldier did not feel as free to act when he was writing the quasi retraxit as he did when he was writing to his mother. I will say, however, that if any officer did use his rank to extort from a soldier such an explanation or modification, he was guilty of infamous conduct. I go further: I recognize that in order to have an army every soldier or officer must yield implicit obedience to every lawful order of his superior officer, but the officer, I do not care what his rank, who uses the opportunities afforded by his position to compel a private soldier to do menial service or to obey any order not necessary to proper discipline is a living, animate mass of infamy. The soldier who endures all the hardships of camp life and the dangers of the field in the service of his country is entitled to the respect due to a gentleman as long as he conducts himself as a gentleman.

I said that in view of the fact that these soldiers ought not to have been subjected to anything except legitimate orders, necessary for the preservation of proper discipline and necessary for the performance of the duties that devolve upon a soldier and upon the Army composed of soldiers, I condemned them and I condemn now, and deprecate any act of any officer that requires a private soldier to do menial service or to obey any order not necessary for proper discipline.

If the Senators who engage in the most eulogistic panegyrics upon the officers of the Army, and defending the officers of the Army against imaginary slander against them, would take some little time in speaking for the private soldier, who does the drudgery of camp work, who goes in the forefront, in the imminent deadly breach, who is exposed more than the generals, as a rule, to the dangers of battle, if they would defend and protect him against, not the proper discipline of the Army, but against the mastery of the officers who command him, they would do a great service to the American Army and a service which would be appreciated more by the common soldiers in the Army than the eulogiums that are pronounced in defense of imaginary slanders against the Army.

It is not a slander of the American Army to point out the wrongs that are done by specific officers and their commands or by specific soldiers, as shown by the facts, and undertake to prevent the repetition of such outrages. It is not a slander of the Army to undertake to correct these any more than it is a slander of the country to punish the man who in civil life is guilty of violation of the law.

But there have been wholesale slanders of the soldiers in the Army; slanders that I call upon Senators on the other side of this Chamber to refute or to give us their judgment in respect to them. There have been slanders against the soldiers of the Army that ought not to have been uttered, and these slanders are made by those who are enabled by the bravery, the drudgery, the hardship, the courage, and the patriotism of the soldiers to wear their epaulettes.

Now, let me read you something and see what Senators have to say with reference to it. I am not here to attack General Funston. I am here to deny the charge that he makes against the soldiers. It was charged that there had been water cures practiced; that there had been tortures practiced in the Philippine Islands, from which some of the Filipinos had died. It was denied by the Secretary of War, and denied upon the testimony that he selected from all the documents he had and sent to the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, who had the information published as a public document. He, the Secretary of War, selected his evidence. The rule of law is that when you select a witness and put him upon the stand you vouch for his veracity; that when you select a document and send it before the courts and before the jury, you vouch for its accuracy and you adopt it as your own.

Here is the document that was selected by the Secretary of War. Here are the writings that were selected by him and sent here as a part of his case; indeed, as his whole case.

And I want to say while it is in my mind just now, that it does not matter so far as the responsibility is concerned whether they are crimes inflicted by the Filipinos or crimes inflicted by the natives upon our soldiers, the policy of the Republican party is responsible for it. When the policy of the Republican party consisted in embarking upon empire, when they started upon an imperialistic policy, whatever that policy involved, they are responsible for and they can not shift it before the people, before the country, and before their Maker. There seems to be some question upon the evidence as to how O'Hearn was killed, by whom he was killed, whether he was tortured or not. The evidence was not sufficient for the Philippine government to put upon trial for four or five or six months the natives charged with his murder, until they could escape, those of them who were not killed.

I say there is some difference of opinion as to how he was killed, but whether it was by treachery, whether it was by torture, or however it was, the policy of the Republican party, as adopted in this imperialistic system upon which they have embarked, is responsible for it.

If there was a young soldier from Tennessee barbarously or in any other way killed by the Filipinos, as stated by the chairman of the committee who has this bill in charge, the policy of the Republican party is responsible for it. If at Balangiga our soldiers took possession of the town and, having taken possession of the town, took 90 natives at one time and 75 at another and put them under duress and compelled them to do work for the soldiers or for the Government, and those natives afterwards arose when they had an opportunity and massacred those who had them in custody, the imperialistic policy of the Republican party is responsible for it, and the blood of our massacred soldiers is upon that policy. If our people, in return, being exasperated to desperation over the massacre of their comrades, turned and burned the town and tortured the natives, guilty and innocent alike, then the imperialistic policy of the Republican party is responsible for it.

As was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] when he was discussing this bill, and he was speaking of retaliation and extenuation in the tortures that were inflicted upon the Filipinos because they had inflicted torture upon some of our soldiers, I can understand how there was human nature sufficient to make them resent it and to inflict torture for torture. I sympathize with the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts when he said that there is human nature in soldiers just like there is in anybody else; and hereafter when our people are denounced because of lynching, which we deprecate, I entreat you to remember that wherever you find human beings you will find human nature.

I remember in the State of Mississippi, in Lawrence County, some four or five or six years ago, a farmer who had finished working his crop, and, before harvest time came, went four or five miles and worked in a sawmill to supplement his crop. He worked until Saturday night and when he came home he saw no light in his house—a log house with two rooms and a hall between them. When he went in he struck a light and his little 5-year-old girl, under the cover, seeing that there was a light in the room, raised the cover and said, "Papa, is them niggers gone?" He says, "What niggers?" She said, "Them that killed mamma and the children."

He went out in the hall and found his wife and four or five of his children dead, and one, an infant 10 or 12 months old, lying dead on the mother's breast. The little girl showed the bloody stick with which her mother and brothers and sisters had been killed and told the names of the men who had killed them; and when the neighbors went and found blood on the men and brought them back and she identified them and they confessed it, those neighbors took out, not some of the race, not some of the kindred, but took out the cruel assassins of the wife and children of their neighbor, a farmer in that neighborhood, and strung them up. It is to be deprecated. We all deprecate it, but can there not be some allowance for human nature in the bosoms of the farmers in the neighborhood who have seen the effects of this cruel murder of their neighbor's wife and children? Can there not be some allowance made for human nature in the breasts of these farmers? Yet in some quarters, because of that lynching, the entire people of the State of Mississippi were denounced as bloodthirsty savages.

I say I can understand how it is that there is human nature in our soldiers seven or eight thousand miles from home who see some of their comrades slaughtered treacherously without an opportunity to protect themselves, at a time when they are probably naked of arms and defenseless, and how they may take, not the guilty parties, but if they can not find the guilty, some of their kindred, and if they can not find their kindred, some of their race, and torture them. If it is human nature to take some of the race and torture them in that case, there certainly should be some allowance for human nature in the neighbors taking out the assassins themselves who perpetrate the cruel deed.

Pardon this digression from the slander of our American troops. Listen to what General Funston says:

> Statements of this kind made by returned soldiers are simply braggadocio and a desire to attract attention to themselves.

Of course, it is only the soldiers who are guilty of any braggadocio. There is no braggadocio on the part of the man who wants to hang hundreds of people because they differ from him. There is no braggadocio on the part of the man who would shut up the mouth of every American citizen who does not take the same opinion he takes in reference to the Philippine policy or the policy of empire. If others think it would have been better never to have embarked upon this policy of empire; if others think that having embarked upon the imperialistic policy it would now be better to withdraw before more of our soldiers shall be slain, they are told they can not utter such an opinion against the opinion of the man who swam a river—the man who took Aguinaldo. That is no braggadocio when he returns to this country and gives out a written statement of his exploits; but whenever the returned American soldier makes a statement of this kind, which has since proved to be true, it is "simply braggadocio and a desire to attract attention to themselves."

But that is not all. Let us go a little further and see what another soldier said; and this is a part of the case that is sent in by the Secretary of War. Here is what the Secretary of War says:

> You will perceive that in substantially every case the report has proved to be either unfounded or grossly exaggerated. The particular report which was called to the attention of the Senate last week, viz, that the "water cure" is the favorite torture of the American, and especially of the Macabebe scouts, to force the natives to give information, and that a soldier who was with General Funston had stated that he had helped to administer the "water cure" to 160 natives, all but 26 of whom died, was already under investigation, which is still in progress.
> I inclose a copy of a letter received from General Funston, dated February 2, 1902, in which he declares the statement to be an "atrocious lie without the slightest foundation in fact;" and a letter from Lieutenant Batson, the commander of the Macabebe scouts, to the same effect.

There is more of this that I will not take the time to read.

Let us see what another soldier, another general, General Otis, says about our troops. Understand, it is all right as long as the officer is not affected, as long as nothing is said that reflects upon an officer in the Army. It is all right to say anything you please against a private soldier. Mark you, this is what the officer whose epaulets are worn because the soldiers, who, with pay altogether out of proportion, do the drudgery of camp life, are ready to risk their lives at any time in defense of their country, and do so, says:

> While there is little truth in letters written by soldiers to their homes—

Who is slandering the American Army? That must be certainly one of the minority of this Philippine Committee, one would say, from all we have heard about the slanders of the American Army. But, no; it is General Otis.

This is May 29, 1899, and here is his entire letter:

> The inclosed newspaper clipping professes to report actions of the Washington volunteers. While there is very little truth in letters written by soldiers to their homes, especially—> by those who wish to impress their friends by their individual prowess—the conduct of the Washington volunteers has been the subject of special investigations for some time. They deny wanton burning and cruelties, and still there are strong indications that they practiced those infractions to some extent. However, the number of prisoners captured on February 5 and during later engagements and the care they have received from the United States authorities show that the Army is practicing humane sentiments. We still hold a large number of prisoners and are releasing them gradually as their friends and acquaintances vouch for their future good conduct. Those now captured are turned loose unless they be officers of rank and importance.

> E. S. OTIS,
> Major General, U. S. V., Commanding.

That emphasizes a certain set of soldiers, but it takes in all the soldiers in the American Army who write home to their mothers, their brothers, their friends, their kindred of any kind. They were not writing letters home for publication to create political effect. They were writing letters home to their kindred, and here is a major-general, who wears his epaulets, as I have said before, because of these very soldiers, who speaks in these terms:

> While there is little truth in letters written by soldiers to their homes—

Not letters written for political effect to newspapers or to newspaper correspondents, but letters written by soldiers to their homes—taking in all the scope of soldiers. He makes no exception. It is true that in his desire to use strong language he emphasizes certain soldiers, but he makes no exception. He applies it to all soldiers writing "letters to their homes."

Now, who is slandering the American Army? Who, I say? Is it the American Senator who rises in his seat and calls the attention of the Senate to the facts which he has ascertained in the committee room when witness after witness has been examined for the purpose of throwing light upon the question upon which it is their business and their duty to have light and the business and duty of every Senator to have light? Is he the slanderer? No. Here is the man who slanders the entire Army, or at least all the soldiers of the Army; and he is a general in the Army, and his slander is sent to the chairman by the Secretary of War to prove that the water cure has not been practiced.

What effect has that had upon our soldiers in the Army? Why, an officer, I am told, can make a private soldier black his shoes, rub his sword, catch his horse and saddle it, or do any other menial service. The Army regulations ought to be made so that no such requirements can be made of a soldier. He does not go to war to be a servant. He goes to war to fight in defense of his country, impelled thereto by patriotism.

Let us see some of the effects of this kind of an idea upon the Army. Let us see who has an idea of protecting the Army and who has not.

I find here in a document which was sent to the Senate some days ago and published—I believe it is in the testimony that was taken by the Philippine Committee—an account of a number of trials that are given by courts-martial in the Philippine Islands. I am just going to read you the first two cases. Let us see how the officers are treated when they are tried and how the American soldier is treated when he is tried. Here comes an officer. This is General Orders, No. 12, on page 2097 of the testimony that is taken on affairs in the Philippine Islands:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 12.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, February 6, 1902.

Before a general court-martial, which convened at Manila, P. I., pursuant to Special Orders, No. 173, Department of Southern Luzon, June 22, 1901, and of which Lieut. Col. Louis H. Rucker, Sixth Cavalry, was president, and Capt. Palmer E. Pierce, Thirteenth Infantry, was judge-advocate, was arraigned and tried—

First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry.

Here is the charge:

CHARGE.—"Murder, in violation of the fifty-eighth article of war."

Specification.—"In that First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry, did willfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, murder and kill by shooting with a pistol an unarmed, unresisting native Filipino, name unknown, a prisoner of war in his charge, and as a result of said shooting, the native did then and there die. This at a time of insurrection in the Philippine Islands, under the military government of the United States, at or near Binangonan, Infanta Province, Luzon, P. I., on or about December 22, 1900."

To which charge and specification the accused, First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry, pleaded as follows:

To the specification, "Not guilty."

To the charge, "Not guilty."

FINDING.

Of the specification, "Guilty, except the words, 'feloniously and with malice aforethought murder and,' and of the excepted words not guilty."

Of the charge, "Guilty, except the word 'murder,' substituting therefor the word 'manslaughter;' of the excepted word not guilty and of the substituted word guilty."

Let us see what the sentence was:

SENTENCE.

And the court does therefore sentence him, First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry, "To be dismissed from the service of the United States and then to be confined at hard labor in the United States penitentiary as the reviewing authority may direct for the period of five years."

The record of the proceedings of the general court-martial in the foregoing case of First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry, having been submitted to the President, the following are his orders thereon:

WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1902.

So much of the sentence in this case as imposes imprisonment is disapproved, and so much of the sentence as imposes dismissal is confirmed and commuted to a reduction of thirty files in lineal rank on the list of first lieutenants of infantry and a forfeiture of one-half of the officer's monthly pay for a period of nine months.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By direction of the Secretary of War, First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry, will be released from arrest and restored to duty.

By command of Lieutenant-General Miles:

H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant-General, Major-General U. S. A.

Now, let us see of what they convicted him. Mark you, they did not convict him of the entire specification. They did not convict him of the charge. The charge was murder. They struck that out. They acquitted him of murder. They inserted "manslaughter" and convicted him of manslaughter; and then the sentence that was imposed upon him was commuted. He was reduced some thirty files in rank and then released from arrest and restored to his command as a first lieutenant in the Army.

Let us see of what they did convict him. Striking out that which was stricken out of the specification, here is that of which they convicted him:

Did willfully kill—

by shooting with a pistol an unarmed, unresisting native Filipino, name unknown, a prisoner of war in his charge, and as a result of said shooting the native did then and there die.

Here is a man charged with murder, and they find that he willfully shot and killed a prisoner of war, who was unarmed and unresisting at the time.

I will put the question to any man who knows anything in the world about criminal law and can take the definition in any law volume of criminal law, how on earth can you say a man is not guilty of murder when he willfully kills an unresisting prisoner, unarmed, by shooting him? If it had been said that he accidentally killed him, that the man was guilty of some criminal conduct and he killed him, or that, not taking all the precaution and care he could have taken, he was only guilty of death by reason of his negligence, that might have been manslaughter, but when he willfully killed him, willfully killed him when he was unarmed, willfully killed him when he was unresisting, and willfully killed him when he was a prisoner, how can it be said that such a man is not guilty of murder?

I should not probably find any fault with that, because that seems to be a part of the necessities of the imperialistic policy that is being pursued by the Republicans, and I wish to say just here that all that has been done, I am going to assume for the purpose of this argument, was necessary; that the Smith burning order was necessary; that the Bell order was necessary, and that the killing of the natives at Balangiga was necessary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is just a small inaccuracy. It was not the natives who were killed at Balangiga; it was American soldiers who were killed.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The inaccuracy is on the part of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The natives massacred the soldiers?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. And then the Americans killed the natives for it.

Now, I am going to assume that all that was done in the killing of Filipinos and in the torturing of Filipinos was necessary and proper for the American officers to command to be done; that it is a part of the Philippine policy; that it is a part of this imperialistic policy, and it is a part of the policy for which the Republican Administration is responsible. That can not be denied. Is it possible that you can avoid assuming a responsibility of that kind? You can not evade it, I say; and what awful, heart-sickening necessities they are.

I probably would not have found any fault with this if it had not been for the very next court-martial. I wish to call attention to the discrimination which was made between the court-martial and the conduct of the court-martial I have just read, in the case of an officer, and the result of the court-martial of a private soldier. Listen to this. Here is General Orders, No. 105:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 105.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 7, 1901.

Before a general court-martial which convened at Cebu, Cebu, P. I., pursuant to Special Orders, No. 2, Department of the Visayas, April 20, 1900, and of which Maj. John G. Leefe, Nineteenth Infantry, was president, and Capt. Edward A. Stuart, adjutant Forty-fourth Infantry, United States Volunteers, was judge-advocate, was arraigned and tried—

Private Phineas Foutz, Company K, Nineteenth United States Infantry.

Let us see what became of him:

CHARGE.—"Murder, in violation of the fifty-eighth article of war."

Specification.—"In that private Phineas Foutz, Company K, Nineteenth Infantry, did enter the house of one Florentina Cenza, a native, and did then and there willfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought kill and murder Geneviva Torres, a native girl, by stabbing the said Geneviva Torres with a sword cane held in the hands of the said Phineas Foutz, private, Company K, Nineteenth Infantry, inflicting wounds whereof the said Geneviva Torres then and there died. This in the house of the aforesaid Florentina Cenza, at Mandaue, province of Cebu, P. I., about 5.30 p. m., November 15, 1900, then as now a time of insurrection against the United States."

Notice the character of the crimes. One is the willful killing of an unarmed man, who was a prisoner, unresisting, helpless, and defenseless, and the other is the murder of a woman. I admit it would be as bad to kill a woman who was not a prisoner as to kill a man who was a prisoner, and who was unarmed and unresisting. Here is the plea:

PLEA.

To the specification: "Not guilty."
To the charge: "Not guilty."

FINDING.

Of the specification: "Guilty."
Of the charge: "Guilty."

There is no evasion about the finding as to this private soldier. Every lawyer who is entitled to his license to practice law in the civil courts of the country knows that upon the findings of fact in the case of the officer he was guilty of murder anywhere in this country. But they found this soldier guilty. There was no subterfuge about that. There was no amelioration for this private, but he was found guilty.

SENTENCE.

And the court does therefore sentence him, Private Phineas Foutz, Company K, Nineteenth Infantry, "To be hanged by the neck until he is dead, at such time and place as the proper authority may direct, two-thirds of the members of the court concurring therein."

The sentence in the foregoing case of Private Phineas Foutz, Company K, Nineteenth Infantry, having been approved by the proper reviewing authority and the record of the proceedings forwarded to the President, the following are his orders thereon:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 30, 1901.

In the foregoing case of Private Phineas Foutz, Company K, Nineteenth Infantry, the sentence is confirmed and will be duly carried into execution at such time and place as may be designated by the commanding-general, Department of the Visayas, Philippine Islands.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

By command of Lieutenant-General Miles:

THOMAS WARD,
Acting Adjutant-General.

This doctrine that there seems to be such a distinction made between the officers of the American Army and the soldiers of the American Army is not only found in the Senate of the United States, but it is found in the courts-martial; and I defy any man, I do not care whom, so that he is a fair and candid man, to say that it is right and just that such a distinction as that should be made between two men who were equally guilty. No man can say that that lieutenant was any less guilty of felonious murder than was the private soldier. One is released from arrest, with the penalty put upon him of a reduction of 30 files in rank, his sword and commission are put back into his possession, and he goes forth unwhipped of justice; while the other, a private soldier, is executed for a crime of exactly the same kind, not one whit more revolting in its details than the crime of which the officer was convicted.

Now, that is not the only result of this policy. I hear Republican Senators say that a Senator is impeaching and slandering the American Army simply because he invokes the power of the Senate and the power of Congress and the power of the executive department of the Government for the protection of the American Army against such imputations as come not as whispering, not as slander, not as aspersions upon the Army, but as come from the sworn testimony of soldiers themselves who have served in the Army and have seen these things.

Ah, Mr. President, it is the intention of the American people to force the probing of this matter to the very bottom. I do not charge Senators, but it will not do for anybody in authority to undertake to shield and shelter the facts from the people. We want an investigation, whether it may be done by bringing witnesses from the Philippine Islands to the American continent before the Committee on the Philippines, or whether it must be done by sending an impartial committee to the Philippine Islands, where they can get the people of all classes and shades and distinctions before them and get their testimony, so that we can pass upon it, whether it be good or bad. It will not do for us to shut out an investigation. I have always understood that when men inside begin to pull down the curtains and plug up the keyholes there is some disposition to shut out from the outside world transactions within. There must be no disposition to shut out the light from the Senate of the United States and from the people of America upon these transactions.

But let us see what is said of an American soldier. It is an outcome of this very doctrine. It is the outcome of the doctrine that the American soldier is entitled to no consideration, to no respect, to no regard, but that whenever you say anything against an American officer or whenever you bring to light the conduct of an American officer, whether you say anything against him or not, if you put it before the world you are guilty of slandering the Army. Here is a dispatch from New York dated March 29, 1902:

The following account of the death of Private Edward Richter in the Philippines while undergoing punishment is taken from the Manila American of February 13.

You must remember that the Manila American is a paper that supports the Administration. It supports the Administration and is ready to make any allowance in the world for the Administration. It hardly makes any difference what the Administration does, the Manila American is ready to uphold it. Indeed, under the censorship which I understand is there, it would be difficult for it to do anything else, and under the law, which, as the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said, would not allow the reading of the Declaration of Independence there on the Fourth of July, they would not dare to say anything in derogation of the Administration. Here is what the Manila American says:

Private Edward Richter was in the guardhouse awaiting trial for some petty infraction of Army regulations. The men in the guardhouse were noisy, and a few minutes after taps sounded a lieutenant of the Twenty-eighth Infantry went to the guardhouse and ordered the men to keep quiet.

For the time being the order was obeyed, but almost as soon as he left the room several of the men began talking, though they did not raise their voices above an ordinary tone.

ICE WATER TORTURE.

When the officer heard the men talking and recognized Richter's voice he ordered the guard to bring the arch offender outside. He then ordered the sergeant of the guard to tie the prisoner's hands and legs. The sergeant obeyed the command of his superior officer.

When the poor wretch's voice had been silenced forever, as it proved, the officer ordered one of the members of the guard to bring a big can of ice water out of the guardroom. Again were his commands obeyed. The can contained 5 gallons of freezing water. The entire contents of the can were emptied upon the face of poor, bound, helpless Richter.

The water, 5 gallons of it, as cold as ice could make it, was taken from the receptacle a dipperful at a time and slowly dropped on Richter's face. He suffered the agonies of the damned. He twisted and squirmed his poor tortured frame as much as the cords which bound him would allow.

COULD NOT CRY OUT.

He would probably have cried out in his anguish had he not been gagged. When the man's struggles ceased, the cords which bound him were cut and an attempt made at resuscitation. No sign of life was apparent and the post surgeon was sent for. When the surgeon arrived, he pronounced the man dead.

Now, what became of that? Right here, while I think about it, I want to put this question to Senators: Suppose when the Democratic minority were appealing to the Government not to go into this imperialistic business, to let empire alone, to be satisfied with the Government here in our own country—a government that gives every law-abiding American citizen freedom, that allows freedom of speech, freedom of thought, freedom of the press, and freedom of action—when they were appealing to you and telling you the dangers of empire upon which you were embarking, and when you were answering that with a proposition that there was money in it, I put the question, If it had been known at that time that this one torture would have been committed upon this man—a soldier—is there a Senator who would still have voted for that policy? If so, then I want to put another question to that Senator. Suppose it had been your son, would you then have voted for it? And let the Senator answer.

Let us see a little further on. Shortly after that the following dispatch appeared in the press:

ST. LOUIS, April 3, 1902.

Published accounts of the torturing to death of Edward C. Richter, a private soldier in the Philippines, are confirmed in a letter written by Corpl. Henry W. Perry, Company C, Thirteenth Infantry, and received by Miss Emma Carter, of 4308 Hunt avenue, this city.

In his letter, which was written more than a month ago, before the story of the torturing and death of Richter had been published, Corporal Perry tells the story of the splashing of water on the face of the soldier, drop by drop, which caused his death from strangulation and intense pain.

CORPORAL'S STORY OF TORTURE.

Before entering the Philippine service Corporal Perry was employed by a St. Louis coal firm and boarded at Miss Carter's home. Her request in a recent letter for information about the treatment of soldiers was answered by his description of the Richter case, which follows:

"Last week in one of the southern provinces"—

I want to say right here that that word "province" sounds harsh to my ears, and it ought to sound harsh to the ears of any American citizen who loves our form of government, where we believe in a government of the people, by the people, and for the people—

"a young soldier was killed by his company's commander."

It seems that this lieutenant was a commander of the company—

"It was pay day, and the young man was in the prison with some other boys. They were talking in a loud manner, having been drinking something or other.

"The lieutenant heard them and told them to be quiet, but this order they disobeyed, whereupon the lieutenant returned and ordered the sergeant of the guard to bring one of the young men outside and bind and gag him.

"Not satisfied with this, he ordered the sergeant to bring him a bucket of water, ice cold. This done, the lieutenant began to drop the water on the helpless soldier drop by drop.

BLED AT EARS, NOSTRILS, AND MOUTH.

"This finally choked the boy, but the lieutenant continued his barbarous treatment until the boy began to bleed at ears, nostrils, and mouth. The lieutenant then began to realize that things were coming to a crisis, so he ordered the boy released from the ropes and gag, but it was too late. He had gone to another land and had passed all earthly torments.

"A day or so afterwards his comrades bore him to his last resting place, where the last rites of a soldier were administered and 'taps,' the sweetest of all bugle notes, were sounded. This call always puts me in mind of that song, 'When the roll is called up yonder I'll be there.'

"This will give you an insight into some of the punishments a soldier has to undergo. Of course, few cases are as barbarous as the one I have described."

We would like to know, would we not, what became of that lieutenant? Here is the description given by papers in Manila supporting the Administration, supporting its policy of empire, and a letter written from the Philippines to a lady—I do not think she was his sister, but a friend of this man Richter. Now, let us see what became of the lieutenant:

Copies of Manila newspapers received here yesterday give some interesting details of the court-martial over a month ago of Lieutenant Sinclair on a charge of having caused the death of Private Edward Richter, of his company, by torture. A cable from General Chaffee, some three weeks since, announced that Sinclair had been acquitted—

That was the lieutenant. Of course he was acquitted—

but that Richter died after being gagged under Sinclair's orders, the private having been drunk and very abusive.

Of course he was drunk and abusive.

The case has attracted wide attention.

According to the testimony as printed in the Manila newspapers, Dr. R. M. Bonar was asked whether the entrance of stomach contents into the air passages of the lungs during vomiting was the most probable cause of death.

"I say it was the most probable cause of death," he answered. "That could cause the condition I found in Richter's lungs. I could not account for death in any other way."

Lieutenant Sinclair, testifying in his own behalf—

"Testifying in his own behalf!" The mouth of Richter was closed. He could not testify in his behalf, but Sinclair could, and what does he say—said that Richter called him vile names and was ordered out of the guardhouse. Richter tried to kick soldiers near him and was tied hand and foot. He continued his abusive language, being very drunk, whereupon Sinclair ordered a private to throw water upon the prisoner. The private held the dipper some 10 feet away, and only part of the water fell upon Richter.

That is, the whole five gallons of ice water did not fall upon this poor bound and gagged soldier.

This performance continued not more than ten minutes. It failed to quiet Richter, and Sinclair then left for his quarters, after ordering Richter to be gagged.

"Did you hear any noise that Richter was trying to vomit?" Sinclair was asked.

"I did."

"Had you ordered the gag removed."

"No, but it could have been done in the discretion of the sergeant of the guard."

Furthermore, Sinclair said he wanted Richter thoroughly quieted, and therefore continued his disciplinary measures.

The testimony tended to show that the soldiers with whom Richter associated were a very tough class and that Sinclair had been a considerate officer.

The War Department yesterday received from Manila the report of the inspector who ordered the court-martial of Sinclair. Judge-Advocate-General Davis was directed to prepare a brief of the report for Secretary Root. It has not been decided yet whether portions of the report will be made public "Whether portions of the report will be made public." Now, the minority of the Philippines Committee are trying to get testimony before the committee to ascertain the true facts in the Philippines and in the Army. We are told to let it alone; that the War Department will get that information; that the War Department is investigating these matters; that the War Department is trying these men who are charged with a breach of law, or of order, or of Army regulations in the Philippines. We are asked to let the matter alone, and told that the War Department will ascertain what are the facts, to give ourselves no concern about it; and here we are told that it has not been decided whether a portion of the report is to be made public.

The testimony of the court martial is expected here in a few days.

Now, there is the case of Richter.

Here is a man who had been very drunk. Here is the Government of the United States providing laws for commerce between the United States and Manila, and when we begin to look into the records to ascertain the true state of facts there we find that more than half of the exports from this country into Manila are composed of whisky, wine, and beer. Yet when we find that an American soldier, exposed to such temptations, happens to so far forget himself, happens to have so much human nature as to love this drink, and goes out and drinks enough of the accursed stuff to become very drunk, and applies, according to the testimony of Lieutenant Sinclair, vile epithets to him, without a trial, without a court-martial, without law, without authority, that lieutenant has him gagged and bound and ice water poured upon him as cold as it can be made until the soldier is tortured to death, and when the lieutenant is tried the verdict is not guilty; he goes unwhipt of justice entirely. That is the state of the case to which imperialism brings us. Is it any wonder that we find, just following down along the same column of this paper, the report of Major Gardener?

But, Mr. President, we are told that all these horrors in the Philippine Islands are nothing more than what might have been expected; that in all wars there are cruelties; that in all wars there are outrages; that in all wars there are tortures and burnings; so that the torch and the sword go hand in hand in war. If that be so, it ought to have been known to the Republican party before they started out upon this policy; and, if we may judge from what they say, what has occurred is what they expected.

We are also told that there have been tortures in North Carolina; that there have been tortures in other sections of the South; that during the war between the States great wrongs and great outrages were inflicted; and I suppose that statement would not have been made unless it was intended to follow it with the corollary that therefore it was necessary to carry on the war as it has been carried on in the Philippines.

If that be true, if because of outrages—and we will assume for the sake of the argument that it has been shown that outrages were committed during the war of 1861—and if it is conceded that it is shown conclusively that there were great horrors and great outrages committed, and that therefore it is necessary to kill the Filipinos, have there not been enough Filipinos killed, has there not been enough torture inflicted in the Philippines to compensate for all the crimes that were committed by the soldiers of both armies in the war of 1861? What is the use to proceed further?

But we are told by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that the order of General Smith was not nearly as bad as the order that was given to Joshua, because that order was given to kill men, women, and children, to leave nobody alive, and that Joshua, under the orders he received from the Almighty, did not leave anybody alive. It occurred to me then as to that, that if the Almighty, who created the universe and all that it contains, and whose we are, as are all the inhabitants of the earth, saw fit to give orders for the destruction of all the people, it does not follow that Gen. Jacob H. Smith ought to have as much authority as the Almighty in giving orders for the destruction of a people and the burning of towns and villages.

What Senator will believe that if it is true that Joshua had orders from the Almighty to exterminate the Amalekites, the Amorites, and the Moabites, that that will authorize Gen. Jacob H. Smith to exterminate a whole people, and that he had authority to give orders to slay everybody over 10 years of age, and to burn and destroy all their property? It certainly does not follow as a legitimate consequence; it is not a legitimate deduction. Here the Almighty gave His orders, and He had a right to give them; and if He gave His orders to kill everybody on the face of the earth, we are all of His creation, and He can do with us as He pleases. He laid the foundation of the earth; He covered the deep as with a garment; He unrolled the heavens as a scroll; He created the universe. He can do as He pleases in the armies of the Lord; He can do what He pleases in the earth or in heaven, but it does not follow that we have a right to be cruel because the Almighty gave those orders. He gave in that dispensation this injunction for our guidance, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

Does not the Senator remember that there came another time and another dispensation, and that there came another who was the true representative and the true personification of the Deity to whom we are erecting and have been erecting all over this country churches whose spires reach almost into the very dome of the skies, and whom we have been worshiping now for nineteen hundred years, and He said when He came—talk about war and the sword—He did not say to go out and kill all who are in the cities, burn the cities, and leave them desolate; but He said, "Put up again thy sword into his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." He also said, through the prisoner of Patmos, "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints."

So that it is not for the Senator from Ohio to justify Smith because the Almighty saw proper to give an order that he wanted executed. The Almighty, in the dispensation of His providence, the other day permitted the destruction of thirty or forty thousand people in the island of Martinique, but it does not follow because that was done by the eruption of a volcano—which is in the hollow of the hand of the Almighty—that Smith would have a right to go there and destroy and burn and slay. There is no argument in it at all.

I want to discuss the situation of this Philippine matter, and answer some of the statements which have been made by the Senator from Ohio, before I conclude the observations that I have started out to make to the Senate. If you will notice, the treaty with Spain was ratified by the Senate on the 6th day of February, 1899; it was ratified by the Spanish Cortes on the 19th day of March, 1899, and it was proclaimed on the 11th day of April, 1899. It is said that certain obligations grew out of this treaty between the United States and Spain which we are called upon to discharge. I am in favor of the American Government carrying out in good faith and discharging every obligation which it has assumed in its spirit as well as in its letter.

The Senator from Ohio says that out of necessity our people went to the Philippine Islands with the fleet of Dewey; that he was in Hongkong, and that after the declaration of war it was necessary for him to seek some other shelter, because by the laws of war and by the laws of nations he was not allowed to remain longer than a certain period in the harbor of a friendly power; that neither of the belligerents could retain their men-of-war there, and therefore he had nowhere to go except Manila. Grant that. I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of war or with the law of nations to say whether that be true or not, and I am going to accept that as being correct as an exposition of the law of nations and the rules of war—that it was necessary for our Navy to go somewhere else; if we could not stay in the harbors of China we must go somewhere else, and that the most eligible place for Dewey to locate was in Manila Bay. When he went to Manila Bay, he went to an island that nominally was a Spanish island that, in fact, was in revolt against the Spanish Government. He went with his fleet to the destruction of the Spanish fleet there, which he so gloriously destroyed on the 1st of May, 1898. When he went there he recognized the fact that that government was in rebellion; that the Spanish Government had no actual authority there, that they had no assertable title to the Philippine Islands, that they had no authority and could exercise no authority outside of Manila itself.

Dewey formed a coalition with Aguinaldo, who purported to be and was treated as the head of the Philippine government. It makes no difference, so far as the justice of the case is concerned, whether the Philippine government was in name recognized as a government by our Government or not. It makes no difference in point of justice and morality and right between nation and nation or between man and man or in the sight of God whether he said to Aguinaldo, "I will take you as an ally and treat you as an ally," or whether the acts of the American Government, represented by its Navy and by its Army, were such as to assert that fact by acts instead of by words. It is a fact undisputed and indisputable that our people cooperated with Aguinaldo in the attack upon the Spanish Government; furnished them arms and munitions of war; furnished them means for carrying on the war for the independence of the Philippine Archipelago against Spain, and not only so, but turned over Spanish prisoners who had been taken by the Americans to the Philippine government, and treated the Filipinos in every respect as allies.

Now, one thing is true, that at that time the Filipinos were in the control and under the authority of the Spanish Government or they were not. If they were not in rebellion against the Government of Spain, then our people provoked the rebellion; if they were in rebellion, then our people cooperated with them and made them our allies.

After the war was over the necessity for remaining in the Bay of Manila did not longer exist. If it did, the Philippine government would have permitted the retention of the port of Manila, or it could have been retained by force, and we should then have had a place of shelter in Manila Bay. So that if it had been held until the actual declaration of peace on the 11th of April, 1899—and it was against the law of nations and against the rules of war for our Navy to be permitted by any foreign nation to take shelter with an American fleet in one of their harbors—we would have had a place for our fleet; and there was no necessity, simply because there was a necessity for going to Manila Bay, and simply because there was a necessity at that time for taking Manila in order to hold possession of Manila Bay—there was no necessity after the proclamation of peace for the holding of it.

Mr. President, the war went on; the two armies fought as allies—the American Army and the Philippine army. Their relations to each other were friendly; they were fighting a common foe. They had in one respect, at least, a common purpose and were seeking a common end, and that was the defeat of that foe. The result of it was that Manila was taken. The Spanish army was defeated in the Philippines, and the Spanish army was defeated in Cuba. The Spanish Government was compelled to sue for peace, and did sue for peace. A commission was appointed by the United States Government, without consulting its allies, to meet in Paris a commission appointed by the Spanish Government, who did not consult the people of the Philippine Archipelago. A treaty of peace was made and agreed upon between the commissioners of the United States and the commissioners of Spain.

If I recollect aright, that was on the 10th day of December, 1898. In that treaty of peace with the Spanish Government it agreed to sell the Philippine Archipelago to the United States for $20,000,000, and the United States agreed to buy for this sum their then allies. In other words, those people up to that very time were allies of the American soldiers; they were allies of the American Government; they were looked upon as such by the American soldiers and by the Philippine soldiers, because of the common expression of the American Army at that time, "We are fighting to free you; to give you your freedom." It was known by our people that the Filipinos were fighting for their freedom, for their independence; it was so asserted by their commander, the man who was at the head of their government. It was asserted by our people time and time again that it was the intention of the American Government to give them freedom.

I recognize the fact that the American soldier had no right, or authority at least, to bind the American Government by such expressions, but the officers who were there with the knowledge of the American Government were constantly consulting the authorities of the Philippine government and receiving official visits from officers of the Philippine government, and that certainly, when it was not protested against by the American Government, was sufficient to bind the Government to whatever they did. When this treaty of purchase was made, without consulting our allies—for they were allies on the battlefield, as was very properly said by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]—that was itself equivalent to a declaration of war against them.

But we are told by the Senator from Ohio that the war against the Filipinos commenced on the 4th day of February, 1899. As I said, I am not familiar with the rules of war and I am not familiar enough with the laws of nations to speak authoritatively on this point. I did not know when the declaration of war was made by our Government against the Philippines, but it occurred to me that at that time the Philippines were not a part of the United States; at that time they had not been ceded to the United States; at that time the United States had no lawful jurisdiction over the Philippine Islands, and had no right to require them to submit to the jurisdiction of the United States or United States officers or soldiers in the Philippines. At that time, and up to the 11th day of April, 1899, the Philippine Archipelago belonged to Spain or the Filipinos were an independent people—one or the other.

If our people had received any indignities from a lot of Filipinos firing on our soldiers the Spanish Government would be responsible for that, because the Philippines were one of her provinces on the 4th of February, 1899; and to-day, if American soldiers should be fired upon by some of the subjects of the King of Great Britain in the West Indies, the American people would not make war upon the West Indies, but the American people would call the King of Great Britain to account for it. So if these people, who were the subjects of the King of Spain on the 4th day of February, 1899, were guilty of firing upon the American soldiers, then the American Government should have demanded satisfaction of Spain for that. As the American Government did not demand satisfaction of Spain and went on and made a treaty of peace we had no right to complain any further.

Now, let us see the attitude in which you put us. You put us in the attitude of treating with Spain, agreeing upon the terms of a treaty, and negotiating with them up to the 11th of April, 1899, and at the same time carrying on hostilities with one of her provinces. That is the proposition you make, or else, if you recognize the right of the Filipino people to act for themselves, that they were acting for themselves, and that they were an independent government that had been set up. then we received no pretense of title from Spain. But if you say there was an independent government set up by the Filipinos themselves for the purpose of governing themselves, then whenever we made war upon them we made war upon an independent government for the purpose of conquest and not for the purpose of reducing to submission a province which belonged to us by the right of purchase.

Why, sir, the law will not allow the purchase of a lawsuit. What would you say if a client were to come to you and tell you that he had purchased from A a lawsuit which A had against someone? You would tell him that he could not lawfully purchase a lawsuit. Neither does the law of nations or the law of right or the law of conscience justify you in purchasing a people who were in rebellion against their lawful sovereign; and when you do it you are purchasing, as you knew at the time, a war, and when Spain is turning them over to you for $20,000,000, she is turning them over to you at "range delivery." No one can claim that the Spanish Government had the power to deliver the islands to us. They may have had some nominal authority, but there is not a Senator here who will say that they had the power to turn those people over to the United States. They did not turn them over to the United States. If they had no power to turn them over to the United States when they were purchased, it was because they were in war against that sovereignty which claimed the right to rule them, and, being at war with them and having set up a government which that power could not pull down, they were practically and virtually independent of that Goverhment; and when you bought them you bought no legitimate title to them, and you only got the right of "criminal aggression," a right to conquer a heterogeneous people.

I believe, as I said in the outset—and what I say regarding this matter must necessarily be desultory and cursory, because I have not reduced to writing a note——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, as I wish to understand him?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If I understand the Senator correctly, he says that when the troops of Aguinaldo attacked the American army on the 4th of February that was an offense against us by Spain, for which we should have demanded reparation from Spain.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The troops of Aguinaldo did not attack our army. There was a fight between some of the soldiers of Aguinaldo and some of the soldiers of the United States, but they did not make any attack upon us. If, however, they had done so it would have been the Spanish Government that was doing it, because the Spanish Government was responsible. Will the Senator say that the Spanish Government was not responsible for what they did up to the time the Philippines were transferred to the United States?

Mr. SPOONER. I am only trying to get at the Senator's position.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I am trying to get at the position of the Senator from Wisconsin. Let me see if the Senator and I agree upon that. Does the Senator deny that the Spanish Government was responsible for the acts of the Filipinos up to the time they were transferred to the United States?

Mr. SPOONER. The Spanish Government claimed that after the protocol and before the ratification of the treaty we were liable for the Philippines and obliged to take care of the peace.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I am not asking the Senator what the Spanish Government claimed. I am asking what he claims.

Mr. SPOONER. I think we acquired perfect title from Spain to the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When?

Mr. SPOONER. By the treaty.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When did we get that title?

Mr. SPOONER. We got it from the treaty.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. But when did we get it?

Mr. SPOONER. When the treaty became effective and consummated by the exchange of ratifications.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. And I think that related back.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Now let me ask the Senator a question. Did we, on the 4th of February, 1899, have a perfect title to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SPOONER. We had a perfect title to whip any body of troops that attacked our men anywhere under God's heaven. That is all I care to say about that.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator can, of course, answer or not. I can not force the Senator to answer; but I should like to have a direct answer, as I am willing to answer any question that any Senator may propound to me. I have asked the Senator a question, if we had any title of any kind to the Philippine Islands on the 4th of February, 1899, and if so what was that title?

Mr. SPOONER. We had a perfect right to occupy the suburbs of Manila under the protocol. I have never claimed that we acquired a legal title to the Philippine Archipelago except by the treaty.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Then the Senator does not claim that we had any title to the archipelago on the 4th of February, 1899?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Then we agree on that point, that the United States had no title of any kind to the Philippine Islands on the 4th of February, 1899. That being so, I have asked the Senator, and I repeat it, if the title was not then in Spain, and, that being so, if Spain was not liable for the acts of the inhabitants of the Philippine Archipelago on the 4th day of February, 1899?

That being so, what was the necessity for rushing into war with those people? We were treating with their sovereign. If it is contended that the Spanish King was their sovereign, we were treating with their sovereign at that time. When a little difficulty occurred between our soldiers and the soldiers of Russia in China our Government did not declare war against Russia. Time and time again there has been trouble between the soldiers of the United States and the soldiers of other governments. It has not been considered sufficient to declare war. Only a few days ago in Italy some of our naval officers were arrested and put in prison, and it was claimed that they were erroneously tried, erroneously fined, and erroneously compelled to submit to indignities, and yet nobody thought of declaring war against Italy because of that. It was sought to accommodate that by some kind of treaty or some sort of explanation or some kind of apology that would be made by one government and accepted by the other.

Can any Senator or anybody else say why it was the United States Government was ready to fight when there was a difficulty gotten up between some of Aguinaldo's soldiers and some American soldiers, not a battle between two armies, not a clash between two governments, nothing that should provoke a war between two governments, but an act which occurs time and again between two governments and for which reparation is made and which is not considered sufficient to provoke a declaration of war?

No; my opinion about it is that anything in the world would have been seized at that time to justify the taking possession of those islands; anything in the world would be seized as a justification for subjugating them, and the policy was embarked upon of subjugating them. I repeat, if Spain was not responsible for their acts and if they were not subject to the King of Spain at that time they were an independent government, and being an independent government they had been virtually recognized by us.

They had been cooperated with by us in a fight against Spain, and that is the practical solution of the whole matter. Spain was not regarded by the United States Government as being responsible for the acts of Aguinaldo's soldiers, because it was considered at that time that the Philippine Archipelago was not within the power, control, or jurisdiction of Spain, and it was known it was not. We had been cooperating with them, and this was not called to the attention of the Spanish Government. It was two days, as I say, before the ratification of the treaty of the Senate of the United States and more than two months before the proclamation of peace between the two governments, the exchange of ratifications, which was on the 11th day of April. It was not called to the attention of the Spanish Government for the reason that the Spanish Government was known to have no jurisdiction over the islands, no authority there in fact, and no authority in law, because a government had been set up in opposition to the Spanish Government which we had recognized as being sufficient to carry on the affairs in the Philippine Archipelago, and it was sufficient for us to cooperate with and treat with them, because we did treat with them when we furnished the government arms for their soldiers to fight for their independence, and we did cooperate with them when our soldiers went side by side with them into battle for the cause of the allies, and we did cooperate with them and recognize them when our Government turned Spanish prisoners over to them to the number of 3,000, committing them to their care and charge.

That is the reason it was not done. If it had been at that time that the American Army and the British army had been close to each other and some of the British soldiers had fired upon some of the American soldiers, the Government of the United States would never have thought of rushing into war with Great Britain on that account. The Government of the United States would have sent its ministers to see the ministers of the Government of Great Britain. It would have gone to the ambassador of Great Britain and laid the case before him. The Secretary of State would have laid the case before the ambassador of Great Britain here and there would have been some explanation. The British Government would have had an opportuniy to disavow the acts of their soldiers. Is it possible the American Government, which is a world power—and that is a fact that we hear so much about now—would demand more of a weak, puny, powerless republic than it would of a powerful monarch?

Talk about world power! This country has been a world power ever since the Monroe doctrine was proclaimed by President Monroe. It has been a world power sufficient to command the respect of all the governments of the earth. The least violation of the courtesies, obligations, and duties that other governments were under to the Government of the United States has been called to account by the United States, and there is not a government which refuses to recognize the power of the United States Government to command their respect. It has commanded their respect ever since the Monroe doctrine was proclaimed. It is not recently that the United States has become a world power. It did not make the United States a world power to conquer a country like Spain. It could have conquered half a dozen governments like Spain. It was strong enough to stand and defy the powers and the armies not only of Spain, but of any government on the face of the earth, the navies and armies of the Government of Great Britain and the Empire of India. The navies and armies of Austria, of Russia, or of any other power are not sufficient to make the United States Government trouble or to permit an insult or indignity to be offered to the United States and not be called to account for it.

Is it possible, then, I say, that this power, this great Government that can command its soldiers by the million, that can command a navy which can take possession of all the waters of the ocean if it sees proper to do so, will demand of the Philippine republic, a republic that has just been born into existence, that which it would not demand of Great Britain, of Russia, or any other great power? Is it possible that this Government would not treat with the same courtesy that young republic that was springing into existence as it would treat the Kingdom of Great Britain? And yet that is the complexion to which it comes, because there was nothing there except a collision between some Philippine soldiers and some American soldiers.

Now, as to some of our obligations. On the same day this treaty was ratified, the 6th of February, 1899, the following resolution was introduced:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

That was not satisfactory to all the Senate, and the following was offered as an amendment:

Resolved further, That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands of their people.

On a vote on that amendment there was a tie—29 to 29—and the Vice-President, having the casting vote, voted in the negative, so that it came within one vote of being adopted as the sense of the Senate of the United States.

This resolution was voted on the 14th, eight days after it was introduced in the House and eight days after the ratification of the treaty. On the adoption of this resolution I have read, on February 14, there were 26 yeas and 22 nays. That was a month and five days before the Spanish Cortes acted upon the treaty. When they acted on it they had this before them: They knew the intention of the American Government was not to retain these islands—that is, that that was the policy expressed at that time. Mark you, these 22 nays were not because they objected to the policy of disposing of the islands, but because they wanted it understood—and they put it upon record—they wanted it put in language that every man could read as he runs—that they were opposed to exercising any sovereignty at all over the islands except so far as to establish an independent government there.

When the Spanish Cortes ratified the treaty, when the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty was made on the 11th of April, 1899, this was before the Government, and there were two things clearly stated there that the Government of the United States did not intend to do. One was that it did not intend to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States. So that we have it settled as a statement of the same Senate that ratified the treaty that it was not the intention of the Government of the United States to incorporate the Filipinos into citizenship of the United States.

What then? Is it possible—it will be asked of every Senator who advocates the permanent retention of these islands—is it possible that you are going to retain provinces and retain the control of subjects to whom you never intend to give any right of self-government, whom you never intend to make citizens of the United States, but to whom you say, "You shall always be under the control and jurisdiction of the Government and sovereignty of the United States without ever having any opportunity to become citizens of the United States?" That can not be. Why? Because there is not a man who believes in the American form of government who can rise and say that that would not be absolutely in contravention of every doctrine, of every teaching, of every principle of this Government from the Declaration of Independence up until now—aye, from the first gun that was fired at Lexington, Mass., in April, 1775.

Then what? They were not to be incorporated as citizens, and further than that was another thing that was not intended to be done.

Nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States.

What does that imply? It implies that it was not intended to retain them. We speak of this as an annexation because we are getting possession of them; and there could be but one interpretation of that in the mind of any fair-minded legist, and that is that in speaking of not permanently annexing them we do not intend to permanently retain the control of them, because in the sense of annexing them and making them part of our territory, and making them a part of our citizenship, that has been negatived by the party in power in the resolution just read. The party who supported the Administration at that time negatived the proposition that we intended to incorporate them into citizenship and annexation according to the idea of the American people, and it had a fixed definite signification by the American people.

There was not an American lawyer or an American citizen who understood anything about our Government who did not know what annexation meant. We annexed Texas. We annexed the Louisiana purchase; we annexed Alaska. It was all annexed because it was intended to make it a part of our Government, but it had a different signification in this case. It was not intended to permanently annex it. That is, it was not intended to permanently retain it. It was not intended that these islands should be put in the category of New Mexico, or Arizona, or Alaska, the Mississippi territory, the Louisiana territory, or any other territory.

But we were getting possession of it at that time, and it was as much as to say that the possession we are getting now is not intended to be retained, and that is all that is meant by annexation in that resolution. It does not mean what annexation meant with reference to Texas, Louisiana, or any other territory that had ever been annexed by the Government of the United States, because when we annexed Texas or Louisiana, or purchased California or any other territory that came to us, we annexed it permanently, and we voted its citizenship into the citizenship of the United States. You can not find anywhere that territory has been annexed in the United States, by treaty with a republic, as was the case with Texas, or by purchase, as in the case of Alaska or Louisiana, but what at the same time the citizenship of the annexed territory was adopted into the citizenship of the United States. But here that was excluded, and it had the meaning that we were taking temporary possession of it.

It does not mean it was to be permanently done, because this implies some kind of annexation. When you say we do not intend to permanently annex, you speak of some kind of annexation, because if you did not intend to annex it at all, then there would be no necessity for using the word "permanent;" but "it is not the intention to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States." It was as much as to have said to the Spanish Government, "We do not intend to retain the control and sovereignty over this territory. What we intend to do is to take them now. We intend to dispose of them." These are negatives. "We do not intend to incorporate the citizenship into the citizenship of the United States. We do not intend to permanently annex them to the territory of the United States." Then what do we intend?

Here it is:

> But it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government—> and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

Not to permanently annex—that is, retain—them, but after a while to make a disposition of them; and we do intend to make a disposition of them. How are you going to dispose of them? Get rid of them. That is the only meaning the words "disposition of them" could have in that sense.

I have given my idea upon this because Senators seem to think we must keep the possession of these islands in order to carry out our obligations to Spain and to the Spanish subjects who elect to retain their fealty to the Spanish King. Senators are very solicitous of the obligations of the United States. They are very solicitous of the honor of the United States when, according to their interpretation, it would retain the sovereignty and control of the Philippine Islands; but when they are called upon to put down barbarities in the Philippine Islands, when they are called upon to examine and investigate the conduct of our civil and military government there, then they are not so solicitous and sensitive of the obligations and duties of the United States Government, but they fly to the charge that we are slandering the American Army, and they come to the defense of the American Army and say the people will sustain the American Army.

Yes; the people of the United States will sustain the American Army when the American Army is doing its duty, and the American Army, with exceptions shown in evidence, does its duty; but that does not mean that the people of the United States will sustain those officers of the American Army who are violating all the rules and regulations of war any more than, when it is said the American Government and the American people will protect all American citizens everywhere, it means that they will therefore not punish the criminals who commit murder and robbery and larceny and burglary, and otherwise violate the law. The American Government will protect its citizens, but that does not mean the American Government will protect robbery and murder and assassination. The American Government will protect and sustain its Army, but that does not mean it will protect and uphold those officers of the American Army in the Philippine Islands who are violating the rules and regulations of war.

What is the result of all this? We said, "Do not embark on this policy; it is a dangerous policy. The people of the United States have been taught to love liberty. The people of the United States have been taught that all men have an equal right to govern themselves, that government must come from the consent of the governed, and that every government ought to receive its authority from the consent of the governed; that no man or set of men are born good enough to rule other men and other sets of men; that no people are good enough to rule another people thousands of miles away." We said, "Whenever you do this you bring reflections upon the very doctrines and the very principles upon which our Government was established." They said, "Oh, there is money in it; there is commerce in it. We want to get the commerce of these islands." We are leading in the commerce of Japan. We are leading in the commerce of the Orient, where we have no control over the people. It ought not to follow, however, that therefore we ought to go and conquer people in order to trade with them. If I had the time I think I could show conclusively by documentary evidence that we are doing better in those places where we have no army, where we have no war, where we claim no sovereignty in the Orient, than we are in the Philippine Islands.

But on this policy they embarked. What has been the result of it? They say our soldiers have been murdered. It is a result of the imperialistic policy. They say the natives are treacherous; that, besides those who fell in battle, fifty or sixty of our soldiers were destroyed by treachery in addition to the friendly natives who were killed and destroyed by treachery. It is a result of the imperialistic policy.

Let us see some of the policy. I find here that on the 26th of February, 1901—I want you to mark that; that was before the Balangiga massacre—a letter was written to General MacArthur, as follows:

> FEBRUARY 26, 1901.
> General MACARTHUR:
> SIR: It is simply horrible what the Macabebe soldiers are doing in some of the towns.
> Wherever these men go there ought to be two or three American officers to watch them, and these officers ought to know Spanish so that they may listen to the complaints of the people, for the Macabebe officers pay no attention to their remonstrances, but on the contrary assist the soldiers in their rascality.
> Yesterday the American officer commanding the town of Montalban came to Manila, and that night Macabebe soldiers went through the streets firing their guns, ill treating the neighbors, and putting people in jail after having beaten them. They stole clothes, jewelry, and money from the house of Captain Tino, a poor old man, who was beaten so severely that he is at the point of death.
> They would not allow the local presidente to go out on the street; they fired at him and killed several citizens. The people of San Mateo know this because many of the residents of Montalban fled to the woods and to San Mateo.
> The Macabebes are committing the most horrible outrages in the towns and the officers say nothing, but on the contrary punish and threaten any persons who make complaint.
> If you, General, would send some confidential agent to Montalban at once to investigate these statements, you will see that I am telling the truth.
> Some twelve days ago some Macabebes went into a house and four soldiers raped a married woman, one after the other, in the presence of her husband, and threatened to kill him if he dared to say anything.
> The war will never come to an end this way, nor will the country be pacified. The people are compelled to take to the woods. The American soldiers and the Spanish soldiers do not do these things, but the native soldiers are rascally thieves.

Mark you, this "outraged citizen," as he signs himself, exonerates the American soldiers, exonerates the Spanish soldiers from this, but charges it to the Macabebe soldiers whom we took into our service over there, similar—not as bad—to the way George III took the Indians into his service to kill and scalp American men, women, and children, and to burn and destroy their property.

> If you will have these outrages investigated, you will see that I am telling the truth. If you direct the punishment of those who have merited it, it would be appreciated by all the peaceful and honest citizens of the towns.
> For God's sake do justice, and the people will bless you.
> AN OUTRAGED CITIZEN.

This man writes like a man who is telling the truth. There is a good deal of truth in what he says. That was on February 26, 1901. This was referred by General MacArthur to the commanding general of the Department of Northern Luzon, Manila, P. I., and General Wheaton referred it to the inspector-general of the department. Then it was finally returned to the adjutant-general, Department of Northern Luzon, and on March 5 he made his report.

Mark you, now; it will not do to say our Army is being slandered. There is no escape from the predicament into which the party in power has put itself by its policy, by charging when these reports are read that the Army is being slandered, because this is all the result and the outcome of that policy.

Listen, now. Here is a report of the inspector-general, Maj. Frank B. McKenna:

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR-GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN LUZON,
Manila, P. I., March 5, 1901.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL DEPARTMENT NORTHERN LUZON.

SIR: I have the honor to report that pursuant to instructions contained in the second indorsement on the within communication I proceeded, on March 1, 1901, to San Mateo and Montalban to investigate the truth of the statements contained therein.

Upon arrival at San Mateo—3 miles from Montalban, the station of the Philippine cavalry whose conduct was complained of—I ascertained that a large part of the inhabitants of Montalban were then in San Mateo, having deserted the former place. In consequence I began my investigation at San Mateo, and subsequently went to Montalban. I requested the commanding officer at San Mateo to cause the prominent men of the town to come before me. In this way the presidente local appeared. At first he was very loath to say much, but upon assurance that his statements would be regarded as confidential he was induced to recite a list of the occurrences, some of which he knows, some which he has heard as having taken place since the arrival of the Macabebe soldiers at Montalban. The sworn statement is herewith appended, and I have translated the important parts of it. I then requested him to let it be known in town that I was willing to hear complaints that any citizen had to make. The result was that a large number of voluntary witnesses offered themselves, each of whom was sworn. The following is some of the testimony:

Martin Anastacio, 20 years of age, lives in barrio Montalban; was in his house 10 o'clock Monday night, February 25, when two Macabebe soldiers, with guns and in uniform, asked him from without how many men were inside and for him to come out. Four men were inside, and as they descended the steps the Macabebes commenced to beat them with their guns; then they tied the four men, and one of the soldiers went back into the house. The soldier inside searched the house and not finding anything took the four men off down the road, taking a peseta from one and some cents from the other. All were taken to the calaboose, strung up by the thumbs, and the witness struck in back with revolver (saw the marks of alleged bruise from revolver).

Policapio Cristi, age 45, laborer, lives in barrio San Jose Montalban. On Sunday, February 17, at 7 p. m., four soldiers entered his house and demanded money. Money was not given, and he and his brother were beaten and then taken to the calaboose.

Paul Concepcion, age about 60, lives in barrio San Jose. Party of soldiers took him and his daughter, age 18, out of the house and into the woods and tried to separate them—he believes to violate his daughter. His cries and pleadings made them desist, and he and his daughter were brought back. This on night of February 25.

It has been a good while since I have read Roman history, but I believe there was one Roman who, to prevent his daughter from being violated, took his dagger out and stabbed it into her breast and killed her. Who would not do that?

And who was responsible for all this policy? I am assuming for the sake of the argument that all this was necessary and proper and right, because I hear the policy defended, and this is a result of the policy. I am assuming that it is all right and proper, but is it not horrible? Is not the policy horrible which produces such horrible results? Can it be a good policy? Can it be a policy that will promote the welfare of the American people which produces such results? Can it be a policy that will redound to the honor and glory of the American Government which produces such results? Can any amount of money that can be made out of it, of commerce that can be acquired, compensate for such results? That is the only justification I have ever heard for it. Would it not be far better that the islands should be independent and, with our superior means of manufacturing, with our superior facilities for commerce, and with our superior commercial intelligence and industry and energy, take our chances to secure what we desire in the way of trade and commerce than to follow a policy which produces such abhorrent results? Let us see, now:

Dauranzo de la Cruz; age, 35, vice-presidente, Montalban: Taken from his house night of February 25 by 4 soldiers; $110 taken from him; kept in calaboose over night and released next morning. This man bears a certificate of loyalty and excellent services rendered to the United States Government from the district commander.

I wish to dwell just a minute on that. There has been a great deal said in justification of the conduct of some of our officers in torturing with this horrid water cure some of the Filipinos, because natives who were friendly to the American people had been killed, assassinated, murdered, by some of these insurrectos, and sometimes they pleaded guilty and sometimes they did not. Sometimes the torture was inflicted upon guilty ones, possibly, and sometimes not, because sometimes those who were tortured confessed. Whether they confessed because they were guilty or whether they confessed because they thought it the safest means to obtain some surcease of suffering and torture God only knows.

While in some instances they confessed, still there were some of them who endured the torture, protesting to the death their innocence. Whether they are Filipinos or what they are, you may say that they went to their long account martyrs—I will not say martyrs to liberty, but martyrs to truth and martyrs to innocence—because they were unwilling in the very presence of the Jehovah to condemn themselves to the crime of which they felt perfectly innocent. He is a martyr who is willing to suffer any torture, any pain, whether by fire or flood, whether it is by ice or heat, rather than to give up his conviction of truth, of innocence, and of right.

Here is a man who had from the district commander a certificate of loyalty and excellent services rendered to the United States Government, who was not only a loyal man, not only a man who had been in the service of the United States Government, but a man who had rendered excellent service to the United States Government, and he had a certificate to that effect from the district commander. He is subjected to these tortures, all of which it must be assumed were necessary under the policy of imperialism; all of which it is to be assumed were proper to support imperialism. I am not saying that any of these tortures were improper. I am saying that a policy which perpetrates such acts ought to be abandoned. A policy that produces such results as these ought never to have been entered upon.

When we said, "Do not enter upon this policy because it will provoke just such acts as these," we were told that there was money in it. You can not say that you did not expect this, because you tell us now that you always knew what war meant; that war meant rapine, plunder, and bloodshed. Senators refer us to the wars of Rome; they refer us to Nero; they refer us to the Tartar candles; they refer us to tortures all along down in the line of history to show us that it was known by them when they entered upon this policy that just such a result as this would come. They did not enter upon it blindly, and they cite us to the very history that shows that this must have been expected when war came. They were quick to precipitate war when there was the least provocation for it. When there was a little difficulty between the soldiers of the Philippine Islands, who had lately been our allies, and the soldiers of the American Army, it was seized upon as a pretext to precipitate a war which they tell us they knew would produce just such results. Oh, the horrors! And they knew that the policy upon which they were entering would produce them.

I am not saying that it is not necessary, because it is a necessary incident to war, as they tell us. I do not impeach the Administration or Senators on the other side because these acts are going on, but I plead with you to stop it, and to stop it now.

You accuse us of speaking of these things for the purpose of making political capital in the coming campaign this year. We plead with you to stop this policy, and to give to those people assurances of an independent government. Treat with them as people who are entitled to be heard in their defense and give them assurances of an independent government, as the Democratic minority here asks you to do, and there will be no campaign thunder for us in that. You are giving us campaign thunder when you refuse to do it. When we appeal to you to take this course we are appealing to you to do that which will benefit you in the coming campaign, because the people will say that there is in your conduct a spirit that commends itself to all magnanimous people and to magnanimity itself, and that is the spirit which, when you embark upon an enterprise that can not be justified, and when it is ascertained that it is such, causes you to recant what you have done so far as you can and abandon the policy that is producing all these abhorrent and horrible results.

Such a course as that would be of no benefit to the Democratic party in the coming campaign. It would be a benefit to the Republican party, and that is what we appeal to you to do. For the sake of humanity, for the sake of the lives and health of the American soldiers and the happiness of their families and homes, for the sake of the good name of the American people, for the sake of the good name of the American Government we appeal to you to abandon this imperialism even though its abandonment will benefit the Republican party in the coming campaign.

Ah, it is not necessary for us to have anything that is said in this debate in order to get campaign material against the Republican party. There has been enough done in this Congress to condemn the Republican party before the people of the United States in the coming election. When we begin to look over and find the kind of a report I hold in my hand, and when the Republican party has pursued a policy that has made it possible, the Republican party will have to answer, and it will be compelled to answer, in the coming campaign. When it is found that in the last five years the exports of beef cattle from this country have increased until they have been very much larger the last year than in 1897, and when it is found that the price of cattle has gone down $10.88 a head, and yet by the policy of the Republican party a beef trust is enabled to raise the price of beef to the consumer day after day a cent a pound each day, running it up constantly, the Republican party will be asked how that came about.

Let me read from a report that came out on the 10th of April. I do not say that it was held back until the beef trust could get in its work, but it seems that it ought to have been presented to Congress by the 1st of January. However, it did not come until the 10th of April, and here is what it shows:

In 1897 the quantity of beef cattle exported was 392,190 head, and its value $36,357,451. In 1898 the quantity was 439,255, and the value $37,827,500. In 1899 the quantity was 389,490, and the value $30,516,833. In 1900 the quantity was 397,286, and the value $30,635,153, and in 1901 the quantity was 459,218, and the value $37,566,980, showing that the value of these cattle exported in 1901 was $10 a head less than in 1897. There were nearly 100,000 more exported in 1901 than in 1897. Yet we find that in some way the price of beef to the consumer is constantly going up by the operations of the beef trust.

Oh, but it is said the Republican party is not responsible for it. If there is a good crop made, the Republican party claims the credit for it. If the price of wheat goes up, the Republican party claims the credit for it. If the price of cotton goes up, the Republican party claims the credit for it. And I believe the other day one Senator on this floor, a Republican Senator, asserted that the result of the Republican Administration was that the price of cotton went up from 4 or 5 cents a pound to 7 or 8 cents a pound. I think that was the statement of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

Then the Republican party will have to answer for other things. The Republican party will have to answer for the fact that millions upon millions of dollars will be taken out of the Treasury every year as to give a ship subsidy to men who have done nothing to earn it, to men who do not propose to give anything to the Government in return. That is proposed to be given as an actual donation to the capitalists, and then when laboring men get an opportunity to work for it, it is said that they ought to be glad of an opportunity to work for the money. It is all right to give it to the millionaires and the multimillionaires, but when it comes to the laborer he ought to be thankful that he gets an opportunity to work for the money.

Well, that is not all. The people will begin to ask another question when the election comes on next fall, and that will be the question, "Why is it that the Congress of the United States, being Republican in both Houses, with a Republican Executive, refused to pass a permanent Chinese-exclusion law and only passed a temporary makeshift?" That question will be presented to the people next fall and to the Republican party, and you will have it to answer. You will be held responsible for that legislation.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] introduced the substitute, a temporary makeshift, which was finally adopted by the Congress and finally became the law. The Senator from Connecticut in a speech advocated the admission of Chinese laborers into the Philippine Islands and into our possessions. He advocated their coming in there, and said it ought to satisfy the American laborer if he is protected on this continent.

Is it supposed by the Republican party that the laborers of this country will not know what will be the result when you admit Chinese laborers into the Philippine Islands and they become workers there and laborers engaged in manufacturing articles and engaged in doing work the American laborers here perform and then allow the product of such Chinese labor to come over here with a reduced tariff? Is it supposed that when you have been teaching them these hundred years that the tariff is intended to protect the labor of this country against pauper labor, and that when these articles, the product of foreign labor, come here with a reduced tariff, it is an assault upon the labor of this country, the laborers of this country will not have sense enough to know that articles manufactured in the Philippines by Chinese and admitted at a reduced tariff will make as much competition with their labor as articles manufactured in Europe and admitted at a reduced tariff.

You will have that to answer. Ah, but you tell us that we finally excluded it. Yes; it was excluded not as the result of the efforts of the Senator who introduced the substitute, but it was excluded temporarily. Still we are told by the Senator who is in charge of this bill, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that these Filipinos are skilled in the handling of machinery; that they are deft with their hands; that they will make splendid skilled laborers. I do not pretend to quote his language, because I have it not here, but that is the substance of it. I have not read his speech, but I heard the speech. It was a very able and very interesting speech, as is every utterance of his, because he is an able Senator and able to present his side as strongly as it can be presented by anyone, and he always does it. But when you tell the laborers of this country that you are intending to retain the Philippine Islands, where they have 12,000,000 of inhabitants who are capable of using machinery, and are deft with their hands, and make skilled laborers, is it supposed they will not know that when you reduce the tariff on the product of the Filipino labor into this country that, as you have taught them, it will compete with their labor? You will have that to answer.

It is not necessary to go further. I could give you a great many other instances. There are a great many other things that will fall upon the shoulders of the Republicans this fall when they come before the people.

So it is not necessary for us to make this argument and get you to make the mistake of refusing to take our advice on it in order to obtain capital to go into the campaign this fall. We beg you, and we plead with you to give some evidence that you intend at an early day to turn over the government of those people to themselves. The Spanish Government knew when the treaty was enacted that it was the avowed intention of the American people not to hold those islands, and that they must look to such government as the American people set up in the Philippine Islands for the protection of their interests and the interests of their subjects.

Now, let me resume the reading of this report. I will read the paragraph preceding the one I last read:

Estaban Samaldi, age 45; Montalban: Claims to have been unwarrantably taken from his house when sick and taken to calaboose because he would not come out of his house when spoken to; maltreated in the guardhouse; half strangled by rope; marks on neck and other bruises on body evident now; released next morning, February 26.

Dauraniao de la Cruz, age 35; vice-presidente, Montalban: Taken from his house night of February 25 by four soldiers; $110 taken from him; kept in calaboose over night and released next morning. This man bears a certificate of loyalty and excellent services rendered to the United States Government from the district commander.

Saturina de la Cruz, age 18; married; lives in barrio San Rafael, Montalban: Night of February 21, after taps, about 10 o'clock, three Macabebe soldiers armed with guns and one with revolver entered her house; she and her husband were asleep; a man with a revolver forced her husband out of the house; other two took him away first, then returned and at the point of a revolver raped her; she was raped again on night of the 25th.

Roberta Magat, age about 45; widow: Some soldiers entered her house, removed the man sleeping there; one remained and raped her, first struck her on shoulder with revolver (alleged mark visible yet).

Valentino Ancsito, age 18; married: On February 25 she was in her house with her husband and a distant relative; four Macabebes entered, took the husband away, and raped the woman; struck her with gun in face; marks still evident.

Francisco Resurestion, the distant relative referred to above, testified she was raped also.

Eccel Memoracion, age 30: Night February 25, about midnight, soldiers in arms entered his house and took him and his brother-in-law to the calaboose; robbed him of 2 pesos, three cocks, and a mat; kicked him and butted him with gun in taking him to the calaboose.

Velerma de la Cruz, age 18; single: lives in barrio San Jose: On night of February 25, about 8 o'clock, raped three times by Macabebe soldiers; could not recognize any of her assailants; was too dark.

Madia de la Cruz, age 30; has a tienda in barrio San Jose, Montalban: On night of February 28 Macabebes came and demanded $10 gold; not getting it they dragged her into the streets and abused her; she finally gave them 50 cents; next morning came again and demanded the same and were given a dollar; then they threatened to kill her and her family; she fled to San Mateo and afraid to return.

Emiliano de la Cruz, age 26, barrio San Rafael: Soldiers entered his house night of February 25 and struck him and his wife and robbed him of $6; saw alleged bruise on chest; attempted to outrage his wife, who was pregnant, but she clung to his mother, and they finally desisted.

Maria San Pascual, 18 years of age, tesified to truth of the above attempted rape.

Juan Torres, age 60, laborer, barrio Burgos, of Montalban: On Wednesday, February 27, at 10 o'clock at night, two soldiers entered his house, occupied by his wife and his son's wife, took him out a little distance from his house, and, after demanding money, told him to stay there or be killed; then went back, tried to rape the younger woman, desisting in their attempts when discovering she was far advanced in pregnancy.

Petra Mendiola, 12 years of age: Sunday, February 25, she was selling buyo in a gambling house; a detail of the guard came in, arrested all the soldiers, took them out; then four men of the guard came back took her and another woman into the brush, and two raped her in succession; this in barrio San Rafael, Montalban. Mother and father of the girl were examined and said they believed the girl's story true. Mother delared the girl suffered much next day.

Segunda Marcella, age 20: On Thursday, February 28, three soldiers entered her house; raped her, one after another. This woman had child four months old; stated she could recognize one Macabebe soldier, whom she knew as Francisco. Commanding officer Montalban was notified. At retreat that night the woman identified the man, and he was put in the guardhouse.

An old woman complained to me at San Mateo that she had been robbed of 100 pesos by Macabebe soldiers the night before—March 1, 1901—and that she could recognize the man. She was told to appear in Montalban, which she did, and identified a Macabebe corporal on outpost duty near her house as the culprit. The commanding officer was notified and confined the soldier at once.

A great many more witnesses were anxious to be heard, but I ascertained that their testimony was generally of the same character as the above, and consisted of assaults, extortions, rape, and attempted rape, but in no cases except those mentioned could the assailants be identified, but all stated positively they were Macabebe soldiers.

Among other witnesses, seven young women from Montalban appeared before me at San Mateo and said they were afraid to return to their homes in Montalban; that upon the arrival of the Macabebe soldiers propositions were made to them which they declined. Unless they consented, they were told, they would be killed and the houses of their families burned. They were afraid to complain, and in fright fled to San Mateo.

With reference to the alleged beating of the old man, Captain Tino (Catalino Calixtro is the real name), mentioned in the anonymous letter of complaint to the division commander, I found that he was not only robbed and beaten, but subsequently killed and his body found in the cane field. Below is the evidence that I was able to obtain:

Being duly sworn, Angel Domingo, laborer, 20 years old, testified as follows: Lives in Montalban. Monday, February 25, about midnight, saw a party of Macabebe soldiers of more than five—about eight—enter Captain Nino's house, drag the old man, who was about 80, out of the house; saw him abused and struck, and then they disappeared into the cane with him. Soon some soldiers returned and robbed his house of about 100 pesos. He knew they were Macabebes on account of uniforms, guns, and language. The outpost of 4 men and a corporal was within 100 yards of place. He thinks outpost must have heard the old man's cries, but did not heed them. He was taken toward the outpost.

Macaria San Pascual, wife of Captain Nino, 70 years old, being duly sworn testified as follows: Saw party of Macabebe soldiers enter about midnight house where husband slept—she slept in adjoining house about 30 feet away—heard the cry of her husband when the soldiers entered; upon hearing his cry she attempted to rush to his rescue, but her way was barred by a soldier at the door; then her husband was taken out and beaten and money demanded, and finally taken away. Soon some of the soldiers returned and she could hear them digging with bolos in the earth floor of the house where her husband had slept. They finally found 200 pesos which was taken. Next morning about 10 o'clock the dead body of her husband was found in the cane about one-fourth of a mile from the house. He was badly cut about the head and body.

Francisco Calixtro, daughter of Captain Nino, aged 34, being duly sworn, testified as follows: After midnight, February 25, party of Macabebe soldiers entered father's house—she slept in an adjoining house—started to his rescue upon hearing his cry; found soldiers at the door; she saw them take her father out; then some returned and took 200 pesos concealed in rice bin. Could not recognize any of the assailants as it was too dark; knows they were Macabebe by their voices, uniforms, and arms. Next morning she found her father's body in cane field with throat cut.

I inspected the premises myself and saw the house that the woman and man who have given above testimony occupied, and where the old man slept. From their positions they could easily have seen all they state. The outpost was, as Angel Domingo says, within a hundred yards of the house. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that this outrage was committed by Macabebe soldiers. Besides the proximity of the outpost to this man's house a skirmish line that night had been thrown out to apprehend certain insurgent officers whose presence in town was suspected. This line was not more than 20 yards in front of the house, and the assault and robbery was either committed by these men or by the outpost. To locate the particular men who were in the skirmish line at this point at a particular time is almost impossible. I ascertained that D Troop, Philippine Cavalry, covered this ground, and called up some of their noncommissioned officers, but could find out nothing. Thereupon I interrogated the outpost which was on duty that night, but they heard or saw nothing. Upon my recommendation the commanding officer now has them all—a corporal and 4 men—in confinement, and the investigation should be pushed vigorously, for if they are not the guilty parties they more than likely were aware of what was going on.

It will be observed that most of these alleged outrages occurred on the night of February 25. This was a night of a "round-up," as stated by the commanding officer at Montalban, and was upon information that General Geronimo was in town securing recruits. As a result, 17 men who claimed to be his recruits were found in one house, but he was not apprehended.

There can be no question that this raid on the town was legitimate if it had been executed under the proper control of officers.

The detachment consisted of about 200 men (Macabebes), First Lieut. Dennis P. Quinlan, Philippine Cavalry, in charge, covering over 2 miles of territory upon opposite sides of the town. Lieutenant Quinlan states that his specific instructions to his men were that no one except noncommissioned officers should enter the houses, and he supposed his orders had been strictly obeyed. For him to superintend the actions of the whole force, scattered as it was, on a dark night, was impossible, and the mistake was in sending such a large number of men with only one officer. Second Lieut. Charles R. Loyd, jr., Sixth Artillery, was out that night with 2 men of the Sixth Artillery, but disclaims any command over the Macabebe detachment, and says he saw no scenes of violence.

Now, let us see what is the concluding part of the report of Major McKenna:

It seems more than likely that the Macabebe soldiers on the night of February 25, under the guise of seeking for General Geronimo and other insurgents, did commit a number of acts of unwarranted assault and aggression. That they fired off their guns in the streets and killed several men, as the anonymous complaints state, could not be corroborated, and is strenuously denied by their officers; nor could anything be ascertained about the rape of the woman by four men in the presence of her husband, but the other cases that I have cited are most probably true.

Capt. F. H. Cameron, Philippine Cavalry, commanding officer at Montalban, believes that the greater part of the complaints on the part of the people are fabricated, by reason of their intense hatred for his soldiers, and because on the night of February 25 a number of the friends and relatives of the principal people were found among the alleged insurgent recruits discovered. There may be something in this, but I hardly think it would cause over 300 families to leave town, as the presidente of San Mateo declared to me was the case. Moreover, the witnesses that I examined impressed me for the most part with their earnestness, and on some were still visible the bruises of alleged assault. At least 200 people desired to make complaints, and I examined over 50, until I found that the evidence was merely cumulative. There can be no doubt, whatever the cause, that the utmost dislike and hatred is felt on the part of the people toward the present Macabebe garrison at Montalban. It probably had its origin in the fierce tribal rancor that exists between Tagalo and Macabebe, but has unquestionably been largely increased by the conduct of the soldiers themselves.

He is speaking here of the Macabebe soldiers—and unless the sternest discipline is imposed upon these native troops by the American officers their usefulness as a pacifying agent for the United States in the vicinity of Montalban or San Mateo is gone.

Major Batson, of the Philippine Cavalry, has been the commanding officer at Montalban until within a week ago, when he went away on leave. He was not there the night of the 25th of February, nor was Capt. F. H. Cameron present—the second in command—the command of the station and the detachment which made the search of the town devolving upon First Lieut. Dennis P. Quinlan, Philippine Cavalry, upon whom must fall the blame for the unlicensed conduct of the soldiers that night. He should have had more officers with him and exercised a better supervision over the operations of his men.

Captain Cameron returned next morning, and the killing of the old man (Captain Nino) was reported to him. He does not seem to have made a very searching inquiry into the circumstances of his death, and was too readily content to believe that it was impossible to locate the guilty parties. Even after complaint had been made to the district commander, and the letter directed to him to investigate thoroughly, does he seem to have made vigorous inquiry. (See telegram appended, marked "I.") He now has in custody four men and a corporal, who, my investigation developed, if not the guilty parties, must know something of the killing of the old man, Captain Nino.

Captain Cameron asserts in his statement, herewith appended, that no complaints had been made to him, and he knew of none that have ever been made, except two or three which he recites were made to Major Batson; yet a great number were made to me, and, in two cases, one of theft and one of rape, I was unable to get the witness to identify men whom they say were guilty.

I desire to respectfully invite attention to the sworn statement of the presidente of San Mateo and Montalban, marked "A" and "B," as to the condition of affairs in the vicinity of those two towns. I likewise herewith append the statements of Captain Cameron, marked "C;" Lieutenant Quinlan, marked "D;" Lieutenant Lloyd, of the Sixth Artillery, marked "E," and those of two noncommissioned officers of artillery, marked "F" and "G;" also that of the commanding officer at San Mateo, marked "H." In conclusion, I find, if the almost unanimous testimony of the natives is to be considered, that the Macabebe garrison at Montalban has committed numerous outrages against them; that these acts of violence commenced almost with the arrival of the Macabebes, and occurred at intervals until the night of February 25, when on that night they must have indulged themselves in a saturnalia, almost, of rapine and violence under the guise of looking for insurgents; that the responsibility for the acts on the night of February 25 belongs to First Lieut. Dennis P. Quinlan; that the subsequent responsibility for not making searching investigation and bringing to punishment the guilty is due to Captain Cameron, Philippine Cavalry.

The sternest discipline should henceforth be imposed upon the Macabebe soldiers to prevent repetition of the acts that have been related.

Very respectfully,

FRANK B. McKENNA,
Major and Inspector-General, U. S. Volunteers.

No one can read this without being impressed with the candor and fairness of this man. It impressed me, and it seems to me that anyone who reads will be impressed with the intelligence of the man and the searching investigation that he made.

Now, let us see what General Wheaton says about it. He was the brigadier-general commanding. The report was made to him on the 5th of March, and on the 14th of March, after he had time to carefully examine and consider it, he makes the following report:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NORTHERN LUZON,
Manila, March 14, 1901.

Respectfully returned to the adjutant-general, Division of the Philippines, and attention invited to inclosed report of Maj. Frank B. McKenna, inspector-general, and report of Col. J. M. Thompson, commanding sixth district, from which it appears that aggravated crimes were committed by Macabebe soldiers of the squadron of Philippine cavalry on the night of February 25, at Montalban. As a result of these investigations all the native soldiers concerned in the commission of these crimes have been placed in confinement and will be speedily brought to trial. I do not agree with the district commander in the opinion that these crimes are the result of the bitter feeling between Macabebes and Tagalos. All native troops, when they can escape the immediate control of their officers, are liable to commit murders, and many will rob and ravish whenever they will have the opportunity.

The squadron of Philippine cavalry was sent to Montalban, San Mateo, and vicinity to replace the Twenty-seventh Infantry, United States Volunteers, when withdrawn to be sent home for muster out. No other troops were available for duty there. The necessity of affairs here obligesus to employ native troops, and these Malay savages will always be liable to commit crime alike disgraceful to our service and an outrage upon humanity.

That is part of the policy you have gotten into. We beg you to desist. We appeal to you to abandon a policy which compels the employment of savages as troops of the United States. Can there be anything wrong in an appeal to quit a policy, to desist from a policy, to abandon a policy that requires the employment of savages, who will commit all the crimes that are alluded to here and which have been proved in the investigation, and proved in this investigation by Major McKenna and by the report of General Wheaton?

I commend that to the careful and candid consideration of Senators. Is not a policy reprehensible that leads to just such a result as that, and in order to defend it that must be the conclusion reached? General Wheaton was not defending the outrages, but he was stating, as a witness, a fact in his report as to what was the necessary consequence of this policy, which necessitated the employment of troops who are savages, who have no respect for the rights of age, sex, or condition; and when you read the entire report of Major McKenna in the RECORD you will see what it contains, you will see the crimes that were committed, as were found to be true by Major KcKenna, by these Macabebe soldiers, by these savages, as General Wheaton denominates them.

When you read that you will see the awful consequences of the policy which has been pursued and is being pursued by the Administration. It ought to be abandoned. It will be a credit to the party in power to abandon it. It would redound to the advantage of that party in the coming elections to abandon it. If that party should see proper to abandon a policy which has led to such awful and abhorrent results as these, it would gratify me, not because it would benefit the party of which I am a member, but because it would redound to the benefit and to the honor and to the glory of the American Government to proclaim to the world that when it finds that it is in the pursuit of a policy that must be pronounced not only horrible but damnable, and which ought to merit the condemnation of every civilized man and woman in the world—that when the American Government finds it is pursuing such a policy as that, it has the honor and the manhood to stand up before the world and say: "Let others say what they please, we intend to abandon that policy, whatever you may charge against us." The American people would commend and applaud the party that would do that. I appeal to you in the name of humanity to do it.

All engaged in the crimes related in these reports will be punished to the full extent of military law, after due trial and conviction.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the necessity for the greatest care and caution in the organization of native troops. We can rely in some measure upon the loyalty of the Macabebes. There are, so far as I know, no other tribes that would not be liable to turn against us whenever they imagined that there was any prospect of successful treachery or treason.

LOYD WHEATON,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

It must be seen that whatever the number and character of the trials it will be impossible to convict all those people who have been engaged in those crimes, it will be impossible to ascertain who they were. Some who are guilty of these awful crimes it will be impossible to fasten suspicion upon.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator from Mississippi would rather suspend his remarks now and go on to-morrow, with his consent I will ask permission of the Senate that he may be allowed to do so.

INDIAN AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL AT WAHPETON, N. DAK.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5356) to establish an Indian agricultural school at or near the city of Wahpeton, in the State of North Dakota. It is a very brief bill, and I desire it considered at this time, especially as we are going to consider the Philippine bill hereafter immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business each day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that for the purpose of establishing an Indian agricultural school at or near the city of Wahpeton, in the State of North Dakota, for the purchase of a suitable site and necessary farming land, to be selected by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the erection of buildings and other improvements to adapt said school to the purposes of an Indian agricultural farm and stock-raising school, $100,000 be appropriated; and provides that only eligible Indian boys shall be admitted to the school, and that the course of instruction shall include principally practical instruction in farming, stock raising, and kindred pursuits.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

A bill (H. R. 5800) for the further distribution of the Reports of the Supreme Court.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to distribute to each of the following-named officers of the United States, additional to those named in section 683 of the Revised Statutes, namely: Each Assistant Attorney-General; the Solicitor of the Department of State; the Comptroller of the Currency; the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; the Judge-Advocate-General, Navy Department; the Interstate Commerce Commission; the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States; the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the attorney for the District of Columbia, one copy of each volume of the Official Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, including those already published and those hereafter to be published, or a reprint of the same, or so many of said volumes as with those already in the possession of any of those officers will make a complete set; and he shall also distribute of the same reports to the law library of the Department of the Interior and the library of the Department of Justice each two sets, and to the marshal of said court, as custodian of public property used by same, three copies of said reports hereafter printed, for use in the conference room, the robing room, and the court room of said court for the use of the justices thereof, and to each United States circuit and district judge who has not already been supplied, one set; and he shall also distribute to each additional United States judge hereafter appointed one complete set of said reports, which shall in all cases be transmitted to their successors in office, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be distributed to and for the use of the committees of said House, ten complete sets of said reports.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall likewise distribute to each of the places where circuit and district courts of the United States are now holden, including the Indian Territory, to which they have not already been supplied under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1889, one complete set of the Official Reports of the Supreme Court, including those already published and those hereafter to be published, or an exact reprint of the same, or such volumes as with those already furnished will make one complete set; and he shall also distribute to each and every place where a new circuit and district court may be hereafter established one complete set of said reports; and the clerks of said courts shall, in all cases, keep these reports for the use of the courts and the officers thereof: Provided, however, That no distribution of reports under this section shall be made to any place where the court is not held in a building owned by the United States, or where there is no United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed.

SEC. 3. That, beginning with volume 183, the publishers of the Decisions of the Supreme Court shall deliver to the Secretary of the Interior, in addition to the number heretofore supplied by law, 74 copies of each and every volume of such decisions, and they shall also deliver the 76 additional copies provided for in the act of February 12, 1889, heretofore delivered by the reporter of the Supreme Court, 25 copies of which shall be deposited in the law library of the Supreme Court.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall likewise distribute to each United States judge to whom and to each place to which the Decisions of the Supreme Court are sent under the provisions of this act or of prior laws a copy of Digest of Supreme Court Reports brought as nearly as practicable to date.

SEC. 5. That such sum of money as is required to pay for the reports of the Supreme Court and for the digest, the delivery and distribution of which are provided for in this act, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for such reports and $20 per set for such digest, the said moneys to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for both the current volumes of reports and the additional sets of reports and digest, the distribution of which is provided for in this act.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the words "an exact" and insert in lieu thereof the word "a."

Page 3, line 2, after the word "set," insert "the judges holding such courts to select the edition of such reports to be supplied for such courts."

Page 4, lines 1 and 2, strike out all after "Reports," line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In four volumes, covering the decisions of said court to the end of the October term, 1898, such digest to cost not more than $20 per set.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is a long bill. It is almost impossible for us to know the particulars, and before consent is given I want to ask the gentleman if the Judiciary Committee have unanimously reported the bill?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The committee have unanimously reported the bill both at this and the last session. It simply provides for the completion of the distribution of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States with digests.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think we ought to have a full explanation of it. I do not want to object to unanimous consent, however, provided the gentleman can tell us what is in the bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It provides for the completion of the distribution of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States to such courts as are not now provided with them and to be accompanied also by the digest; and it authorizes the judges of the court to select either the official edition or any other edition that they like of the Supreme Court reports. It also authorizes them to select either digest that they like of the Supreme Court reports. It furnishes about 75 new sets. The bill was rendered necessary by reason of the fact that there are a great many courts unprovided with them, and there are also various departments unprovided with them. The bill was unanimously reported in the last session and unanimously reported at this session.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I suggest to my colleague that it also provides sets for the various committees of the House that need them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I notice, if the gentleman will permit me, that this makes an open appropriation. I would be glad if the gentleman would explain that. The amount appropriated for the purposes of the bill is not set out. How much is it supposed it will cost? It is simply an open appropriation and no amount specified.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is no appropriation in the bill, if I remember aright.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The language of the bill is "and an amount sufficient is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" for the purposes of the bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. About $40,000 covers the whole expense.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Forty thousand dollars?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. I simply desire——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Just a moment. I desire to submit another amendment in lieu of the last amendment offered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Is unanimous consent given to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MADDOX. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Does this provide for furnishing a copy, for instance, to the judge who presides at two or three different places? Do you propose to furnish it to the different divisions where the courts are held?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. I will read the portion of the bill which covers that:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall likewise distribute to each of the places where circuit and district courts of the United States are now holden.

To each place.

Mr. MADDOX. Well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York desires to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment just sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all on page 4, lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, after "laws," on line 4, and insert in lieu thereof: "a copy of such digest now published, or in course of publication, of the Supreme Court Reports, in four volumes, covering the decisions of said court to the end of the October term, 1898, or a later period, and to cost not more than $26, as the several judges and officials shall select respectively."

In section 5, page 4, line 16, insert the word "six" between the words "twenty" and "dollars."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will state to the gentleman from New York that this amendment is introduced to enable the judges and the various officials to select the digest they prefer. One digest, published by the Lawyers' Cooperative Association, provided for in the original amendment, costs $20, and another recently issued by another concern costs something like $26. The maximum is made $26, so that the judges can select the digest that they prefer.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill as amended, and I trust it will pass. I understand this amendment perfects the bill and meets with the approval of the judges of the Federal courts, and that they are in favor of this bill with this amendment. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and as amended that the bill will pass without division.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. At present, as I understand it, the reports of the courts of appeals of the several States are furnished to the Congressional Library and are in the law library. I desire to know if this bill under consideration provides for furnishing current copies of the United States Supreme Court Reports to the various State libraries in the several States?

Mr. SULZER. The law, I believe, substantially does that now.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not in terms refer to the State libraries of the various States. It only provides for the courts of the United States and the officials of the United States. This bill does not disturb the existing provisions of the law in that respect.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from New York says that the law does that now. I think he is in error as to that. The several libraries of the States are maintained usually in the capitals of the States and are a part of the library of the court of appeals, but they have to purchase the United States Supreme Court Reports. There is no existing provision of law for the distribution of those reports to the various State libraries.

Mr. SULZER. That is so—not all the State libraries.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This bill does not undertake to accomplish that. We only go so far as to provide for the United States courts and the United States officials.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the committee amendments will have to be passed upon first, and then the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am authorized, Mr. Speaker, by the committee to submit this last amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

The question was considered and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine by direction of the committee.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLEFIELD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOMESTEADS IN THE UTE RESERVATION.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12796, providing for free homesteads in the Ute Indian Reservation, in Colorado.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the homestead laws be, and are hereby, extended over and shall apply to the lands included within the limits of the former Ute Indian Reservation in Colorado, in addition to the provisions of existing laws relating to cash entries thereon: Provided, That no selection or entry of lands in lieu of land included within a forest reservation or of soldiers' or sailors' additional homesteads shall be allowed within said limits.

SEC. 2. That all sums of money that may be lost to the Ute Indian fund by reason of the passage of this act shall be paid into the fund by the United States, and all moneys received by reason of the commutation of any homestead entry shall be credited to said Ute Indian fund.

SEC. 3. That no lands shall be included in any location or settlement under the provisions of this act on which the United States Government has valuable improvements.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. What does this bill propose to do?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to explain to the gentleman. When we passed the free-home bill, this and two or three reservations were supposed to come under the provisions of the act. The land offices took cases for almost a year, and then the General Land Office or Attorney-General decided that, this being set apart by special act, the general act did not reach it. A like bill from Washington has already been passed, and I believe this is the last one. The only thing this does is to permit homestead as well as cash entries on the Ute Indian Reservation, and while there is quite a little land in the reservation there are probably forty-nine fiftieths of it a part of a great range of mountains. There are some little parks, and there will be probably fifty or a hundred thousand acres taken under the homestead act.

Mr. CANNON. What is the size of the reservation?

Mr. BELL. The size of the reservation originally was about 12,000,000 acres, but this reservation is not in the plain part of Colorado, but in what is called the park and mountain chain region. Pretty nearly all of it is mountain, as it is in what is called the park system. There will be a million acres of mountain to 100 acres of park. Now, the most of this land that has been taken and will be taken is taken under the mining law and under the preemption, arid-land, stone, and timber acts. None of the cash-entry acts are disturbed. It simply gives the right of homestead on this domain which has never enjoyed homestead privileges.

Mr. CANNON. The United States bought this land from the Ute Indians?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Has the United States paid for it?

Mr. BELL. The United States has paid for it, as the lands have been sold.

Mr. CANNON. Now, this legislation covers between one and two million acres of land——

Mr. BELL. Oh, no——

Mr. LACEY. Over 10,000,000 acres are involved.

Mr. BELL. There are 10,000,000 acres in the whole tract; but there is not one acre in a thousand that could be taken.

Mr. CANNON. But, as I understand, this legislation throws open 10,000,000 acres of land heretofore belonging to the Ute Indians, and under treaty, as the lands are disposed of, those Indians are to be paid. Now, this takes the whole 10,000,000 acres belonging to the Ute Indians and throws them open to homestead settlement, and makes the Government liable at once——

Mr. BELL. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. Well, how is it then?

Mr. BELL. The mineral lands and the lode claims are now entered at $5 an acre, while the Government pays only $1.25; and the coal lands, embracing many square miles—all of the coal lands of the Grand Junction, the Delta, the Gunnison, and the Durango countries—sell from $10 to $20 an acre, while the Government pays only $1.50. There will probably be ten claims taken in the future under the stone and timber act, and possibly the preemption act, to 100 taken under the homestead act. There are only a few places where land can be taken as homesteads, by reason of the lack of water. It must be borne in mind that two great timber reserves, amounting to millions of acres, have already been taken out of this vast tract.

Mr. LACEY. About seventeen hundred thousand acres.

Mr. BELL. Yes. The lands taken by the Government as timber reserves are to be paid for at $1.25 an acre. The valleys where watered are now well settled and in the highest state of cultivation—land having already been taken under the preemption laws, under the desert-land act, and under the stone and timber acts. And there is no question that from five to six claims will be taken under the other acts, outside of the mining act, to one taken under the homestead act. The decision of the Government is that it has to pay nothing until the claim is actually proved up, I believe, and the Government will doubly recoup itself out of the mineral lands that are now selling from $5 to $20 an acre.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me make a suggestion in relation to the homestead entries. Not half of the homesteads that will be taken up under the provisions of this act will be free homesteads. The custom in that country is (and it pays the settler to do it) to live upon the land for fourteen months and then commute by paying $1.25 an acre. This has been almost invariably done in that part of the country up to the present time under the preemption act. There is hardly a chance that half of this land will be taken up at all, and not more than a twentieth part of it can be taken for homesteads. Not more than a half will be obtained from the Government free of charge.

Mr. BELL. Not one acre in a thousand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Perhaps not that much.

Mr. CANNON. Under the treaty with these Indians, and as the law now stands, these lands are taken under the desert-land act and the stone and mineral land laws which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] speaks of; and as the Government is paid for them, it pays the Indian——

Mr. BELL. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre.

Mr. CANNON. And the Government does not pay the Indians until that is done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And it will not under this bill, as I understand, until the land is located.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want the attention of the gentlemen to this point. This bill proposes to make the homestead laws apply to lands in the reservations. Those laws do not now apply. Am I correct about that?

Mr. BELL. That is right.

Mr. LACEY. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I will say that the free-home policy, which was in controversy in this House for so many years, was practically decided upon as to all or nearly all of the reservations, with the exception of this one, which would undoubtedly have been included at the time but for the fact that it was overlooked—not because of its size, because it was big enough to have been seen (for there are about 9,000,000 acres of it left), but it was overlooked because of the fact that there was a comparatively small amount of the land that anybody could live on as homestead land, and therefore it was not directly included in the free-home bill, and consequently under the terms of the original Ute act it was open to cash entry only; it was not included in the general free-home bill.

So, Mr. Speaker, the House will be surprised to learn that there are 9,000,000 acres of land there that could not be settled on under the homestead law at all, owing to the old Ute treaty. Now, by passing this law, placing those in the same category with the Sioux Reservation and with the forest reservations, to which the free-home law has heretofore applied, it will open this land. Although there are 9,000,000 acres of it in amount to be settled on, I do not believe the amount to be settled on will be very large. I wish the whole 9,000,000 acres could be settled, but only a small proportion of it can possibly be settled on as homesteads, because of the fact that it lies in the roughest part of Colorado.

Mr. BELL. Yes; it is right among the high mountain ranges.

Mr. CANNON. Then I understand of the 9,000,000 acres which is to be opened to homestead settlement the moment that is done by the homesteaders the United States is bound under treaty——

Mr. BELL. It pays for it when it is proved up on. Let me suggest to the gentleman, if he will allow——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. They will take 10 acres under the coal acts to 1 acre under the homestead act. Now, we know that, because there are the greatest coal fields in Colorado or in the West in Gunnison, Montrose, Delta, Mesa, Montezuma, Garfield, Pitkin, Routt, Rio Blanco, and other counties.

Mr. LACEY. They can do that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is $20 an acre.

Mr. BELL. The Government sells that at from $10 to $20 an acre and it keeps out all but $1.25. The great San Juan mines are in this region, the greatest in the West, and the Gunnison mines and the Aspen mines are all in this locality, but they sell all those lode claims at $5 an acre. All of the placer claims are sold at $2.50 an acre, and it only pays them $1.25. Now, we simply take it out of that, and I can guarantee there is not over 50,000 to 100,000 acres at the outside that can possibly be taken under homestead laws under present conditions. It is among mountain ranges.

The great Black Canyon and the Great Uncompahgre, San Juan, and other mountain ranges are there, and all of that mountain region comprising two parallel mountain ranges, with many short cross ranges with peaks going up among the clouds—the highest in the entire Rocky Mountains. There is just a little park here and there. I want to say, further, to the gentleman that nine-tenths of all the land that can be settled is now under a high state of cultivation under the preemption law, and most of our settlers who can be benefited are a lot of old men in there who have taken their preemption claims heretofore and would like to take homesteads. The poor fellows can take a few cows and go up in the mountains, get a homestead at some little stream, and they can live there and can make a living. This constitutes the demand for this act. The ordinary citizen will still take his land under the timber act and under the stone act, preemption, or arid-land act, because there is no water except just in the little stream here and there high up in the mountain, where homesteaders can graze their stock and grow a little hay and vegetables.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman another question. The gentleman admits that of these 9,000,000 acres now thrown open to homesteads there will be proved up a hundred thousand?

Mr. BELL. From fifty to one hundred thousand.

Mr. CANNON. And the title will go to the homesteader free?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And the moment it does, the Government must pay the Indian under the treaty?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. A dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; but from $2.50 to $20 per acre have already been obtained from these mineral and coal lands, out of which to repay it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, you have the whole thing in a forest reservation, have you not?

Mr. BELL. No; they have taken out a couple of million acres for forest reserves, against our protest—we did not want them; the Government wanted them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, in those forest reserves, these lands of the homesteader go into the forest reserve.

Mr. BELL. No; he can not touch it at all. The forest reserves are ten or twelve thousand feet above sea level.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will find, in line 6, an amendment offered by the committee: "not included in any forest reservation."

Mr. BELL. It does not touch the forest reservation. It is hard to get up to the Battlement Mesa Forest Reserve, on north side, horseback, and from south side by light wagons. Those are away up at the head of the stream, on top of the mountain ranges.

Mr. CANNON. Does this meet the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. LACEY. I will say that it did.

Mr. CANNON. Is there not some other reservation we can get?

Mr. LACEY. I would be glad to find another one or two.

Mr. BELL. We have passed one already this session.

Mr. CANNON. I do not see my golden-haired friend from Nevada on the floor at this minute. If I did, I would ask him to sound a trumpet call in favor of the irrigation bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. He did that yesterday.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, for whom I have very great regard, that if I had understood what this was, I think I should have interposed an objection; but it was not interposed, and I am ready for the House to dispose of it.

Mr. BELL. We will reciprocate in the future.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say right here that the truth is we are engaged in making treaties with the Indians. I fancy that some legislation is now pending to extinguish Indian titles, and to buy 1 acre of good land, and in buying it to get half a dozen acres of that which is of no account, and to pay two or three prices for it, the land to be thrown open to free homes; and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the result will be that the free home will go to the man who wants a great range and has his access to water. The Treasury is heavily burdened, and the multitude in whose name all this is done are not accommodated. Sometimes when I see these things come trooping along, I am reminded of that exclamation of the celebrated French woman, "O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" And I think,

"O people, poor people, what crimes are committed in your name." [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUNDRY PAYMENTS FROM THE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I submit several resolutions, and ask that they be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BULL], chairman of the Committee on Accounts, by authority of that committee, calls up the following resolution:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be, and hereby is, authorized to purchase and retain in his care an emergency case of medicine and suitable instruments for minor operations, for use in case of illness or accident to persons in attendance at the House, same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, in an amount not to exceed $500.

With the following amendment:

Provided, That said case and instruments shall be examined and approved by Representatives WILSON of New York, SHOWALTER of Pennsylvania, and BALL of Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Also the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Mrs. Jessie A. Glenn, widow of William J. Glenn, late Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, the sum of $2,514.93, being the balance of one year's salary, from December 1, 1901, and also the expenses connected with the funeral of said Glenn upon vouchers approved by the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was agreed to.

Also the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $275 to such person or persons as may be designated by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for clerical services rendered to said committee during the present session.

The resolution was agreed to.

Also the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to provide for the payment to the following conductors of the House elevator in the House wing of the Capitol, to wit, L. B. Cook, George Winters, M. F. O'Donnell, and S. A. Barnes the difference between $1,100 and $1,200 per annum from July 1, 1899 to July 1, 1902, as has been customary in the past under the deficiency bill.

In lieu of which the committee recommend the following substitute:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized to make provision in the general deficiency appropriation bill as follows:

To pay to the conductors of the elevators in the House wing of the Capitol the difference between the amounts received by them and the rate of $1,200 per annum, from July 1, 1900 to June 30, 1902, inclusive, each as follows:

L. B. Cook, $200; George Winters, $200; M. F. O'Donnell, $300; S. A. Barnes, $200; in all $800.

The SPEAKER. The question will be upon the substitute resolution.

The substitute was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 14046), and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended one hour. I do so upon the request of my colleague upon the committee [Mr. MEYER of Louisiana], who has charge of the time upon the other side of the House, in view of the fact that the House has already occupied a large portion of one hour in unanimous consents, which time we expected to occupy in general debate upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14046, and pending that motion he asks unanimous consent of the House to extend the general debate until 4 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. Pending that question, I would like to ask the gentleman what time will that close general debate?

Mr. FOSS. At 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14046, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask what is the situation as to time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman in a moment. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Illinois has two hours and twenty minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Louisiana one hour and eight minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment upon a question to which I presume the attention of every member of the House has been called, not only by the able arguments made on the floor on yesterday, but by the continuous appeal to members through the medium of the post-office, touching the question of the construction of battle ships and other ships of the Government in the navy-yards of the country. The matter has assumed such a shape that while I do not feel inclined to go to the full extent that was insisted upon by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], I do believe that the time has come when there ought to be a careful investigation of the subject-matter of this controversy made in order that the exact facts can be obtained.

I do not believe—and indeed I was gratified to hear the position of the gentleman from North Carolina—I do not believe that the members of this House would be carried away by any appeals that might be made to them to undertake to build the future Navy of the United States in the navy-yards if it was to cost a material and considerable sum greater, after the permanent establishment of the work in the navy-yards, as compared with the work under contract. Indeed, I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that if upon full investigation it became satisfactorily established that the cost to the Government was much greater—I do not know that he made any percentage—he would not favor the proposition. Now, my proposition is that we do not take all the ships at this time and undertake to construct them in the navy-yards, because I recognize that sort of thing would not be a satisfactory test of the relative cost under the one system or the other system.

What I would like to see would be such authority given to the Secretary of the Navy as would enable him to construct in a navy-yard—and I assume it would be in the best navy-yard fitted for the purpose—one battle ship, one armored cruiser, and one or more gunboats, and let by contract to the best bidder in the United States an equal number of the same class of vessels, and thus ascertain by the best method possible the relative cost of the two propositions. I did not listen to the whole debate, but I have heard it stated very often that the Secretary of the Navy would not be able to ascertain these facts. I do not believe that. I believe that a condition of facts sufficient to guide the future action of the Government can readily be ascertained through the Navy Department, and I assume that there will be no discrimination or any attempt by unfair reports to prevent the ascertainment of the cost. I take it that the Navy Department will be very willing to build ships themselves if they can do it as cheaply and as well in all respects as if it were done by private contract.

Now, it is said that there are some elements that enter into the building of a ship by the Government that do not enter into the cost of a ship constructed by a contractor, and that those elements can not be ascertained and measured. I admit that that can not be done to an absolute mathematical demonstration to a dollar, but I believe it can be told near enough. The question of administration ought necessarily to enter into the construction of a ship by the Government in a navy-yard. The salaries and expenditure of money for inspectors and constructors and whatever else there may be, and if there is a greater expenditure of money in the Government navy-yards than in a private shipbuilding yard, that is a question for ascertainment by the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I estimate the character of the new Secretary of the Navy correctly, and I think I do, after the time that he has been a distinguished member of this House, I do not believe that the problem that would thus be submitted to him would be one difficult of accomplishment. I think I know enough of the mind of Mr. Moody to know that he would not fail in the ascertainment of this question. He is a man of the highest character, full of true ambition, clear-headed, and thoroughly capable. Those of us who know him well feel the greatest confidence in his ability to give us the facts we need for the correct solution of this problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSS. I yield the gentleman more time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care to occupy it.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I merely would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. If I understood the gentleman, he said that he favored in this bill a provision for the building of one battle ship or one armored cruiser and one gunboat in the navy-yards.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One or more gunboats as would make as complete and as perfect a test as the genius of the Department could bring about.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. The gentleman understands that this bill provides that one battle ship or one cruiser only shall be built in the Government yards, and that as for the other five the Secretary of the Navy shall have the discretion whether they shall be built there or by contract.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly, I am aware of that. But I would provide that this test should be made; I would stipulate it in the bill. I do not propose to offer an amendment to the bill, because I never do anything of the kind when a bill of this character has been prepared at the expenditure of so much time and study by so able a committee as this. I only rose to impress upon the committee that, in my judgment, there ought to be a test; and if the bill already provides sufficiently to justify the Secretary of the Navy in making this ascertainment, why that is quite sufficient for my purpose. I want to have the question tested once and forever, or as near forever as it is possible to get results to project themselves forward in the knowledge and judgment of the people of the country.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. But I do not understand the gentleman to set his face in favor of saying that the bill shall provide that one-half of these vessels shall be built in the navy-yards?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. I only want to provide that a test shall be made, and a fair one, and that the ascertainment shall be complete. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair desires to state that in the hasty computation of time a slight mistake was made. The gentleman from Louisiana has fifty-five minutes, instead of an hour and eight minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois has one minute more.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the liberal provision the committee has made for Puget Sound Navy-Yard and its development is very gratifying to our people. We have felt heretofore that we have been neglected by the committee. We have felt that the neglect was due to lack of information, probably, relative to the conditions in our country, and it is rather amazing to us to find out the lack of information, or rather the misinformation, that individuals have with reference to the Puget Sound country.

This is not confined to any particular class. The ideas of many high in authority are really surprising and, in many cases, ridiculous. Many members of Congress seem to have erroneous ideas as to the State of Washington, its climate, and productions. What shall we say of a great statesman, who had traveled all over the world, who, at Seattle, looking out on Puget Sound, which stretches away to the sea through a channel from 3 to 20 miles wide and from 300 to 1,500 feet deep, asked, "Can large vessels get from here to the sea?" How amusing it is to have a Congressman ask, "How can you stand the cold out there?" when the thermometer never gets in sight of zero. I was urging upon one of our high naval officers some matters in relation to the Puget Sound Navy-Yard, and he innocently asked, "Have you any dry dock there?" Such a question seemed to me hardly excusable, when the fact is that we have the only dry dock on the Pacific coast in which a battle ship has ever been docked. To the members of this committee who care to listen I shall try to give some little information relative to our navy-yard and Puget Sound.

Puget Sound is the term or name given to the tree-like projection of the Strait of Fuca within the limits of the State of Washington. It applies to no single body of water, but includes all the bays, gulfs, straits, sounds, and inlets into which the strait divides. Its shore line, including all its windings and circlings, is almost 2,000 miles in length. Its channels are deep enough to float the largest battle ships. Its harbors are almost countless in number, spacious in extent, of sufficient depth for the largest ships, and in many cases landlocked. It is destined to become the greatest commercial port on the Pacific and probably in the world. Upon its bosom might float the vessels of the world's commerce and all the naval armanents of earth without crowding. It is near Alaska. It is on the nearest route to the Orient. Upon its shores are the terminals of three great transcontinental railway lines connecting with great ocean steamships to China and Japan, and the time is not far distant when, under proper encouragement, the greyhounds of commerce will leave here for all ports of the world.

Bordering its shores are the greatest lumber forests in the United States. In the near-by mountains are inexhaustible stores of coal and iron awaiting the touch of our civilization. Fish of all kinds sport and glisten in its limpid waters, and the "lordly salmon" delights the fisherman and feeds the world.

Its surface is like liquid glass or, when the sun is low in the west, molten gold. Seldom is it ruffled by the passing wind, save in its main channels. Its arms and channels encircle emerald isles of surpassing productiveness and beauty. Its shores are fringed with evergreen forests or rise abruptly in towering cliffs crowned with lofty fir and majestic cedar. In its limped depths are photographed the God-throned Olympics and the towering Cascades, whose lofty crests are frosted with the snows of the eternal ages and around whose cloud-piercing summits the mists of the sky lovingly linger as if to catch the first kiss of the early morning or to hold in loving embrace the halting rays of fading twilight.

The Puget Sound Navy-Yard is located on Sinclair Inlet, one of the bays of this beautiful body of water. It is about 125 miles inland from the mouth of the Strait of Fuca and about 15 miles from Seattle. There are two entrances from the main channel of the sound or from what is called Elliott Bay, the harbor in front of Seattle—Agate passage to the north and west of Bainbridge Island and Richs passage to the south. Agate passage is quite narrow and more than 11 miles in length. Richs passage is about 3 miles long and nowhere more than 1,500 yards wide, and at the throat, for a distance of about a mile, it is only about 700 yards wide.

The selection for a site for a navy-yard on the North Pacific coast was provided for in an act of Congress passed in 1888. A commission was appointed, consisting of Capt. A. Mahan, Commander C. M. Chester, and Lieut. C. A. Stockton. After a careful investigation they selected the present site of the yard, Port Orchard, or Bremerton. In 1890 another act of Congress was passed providing for another commission, this one being composed of Capt. T. O. Selfridge, Col. George H. Mendell, Corps of Engineers; Hon. F. C. Platt, Hon. R. W. Thompson, and Lieut. A. B. Wyckoff. This commission, after a very careful investigation, selected the same site.

Secretary W. C. Whitney, in his instructions to the first commission, gave them the requirements of a good site for a navy-yard, and to these I want to call your attention in detail.

First. A situation upon a good harbor of sufficient depth and accessibility for vessels of the largest size and heaviest draft.

This requirement could not be met better than by the harbor at the Puget Sound Navy-Yard. The channels leading to it are deep enough to float vessels of double the draft of our greatest battle ships at any and all times. In the harbor itself there is room enough to float the entire Navy in water ranging in depth from 5 to 10 fathoms at mean low tide.

In this connection I want to notice a statement made by Admiral Melville in his testimony before the Naval Committee which is susceptible of misconstruction. Referring to the depth of the channels at Mare Island and at Puget Sound, he was asked by Mr. DAYTON: "Do you have any idea of the depth of the channel there?" meaning Puget Sound. Admiral Melville: "No, sir; there is difficulty at Puget Sound because they can not anchor there. It is too deep. It is not safe to anchor in more than 25 fathoms of water. A modern sailor does not like to anchor in more than 10 fathoms or 60 feet."

This is true to a great extent of the main channels of Puget Sound. Sinclair Inlet, the harbor of our navy-yard, however, complies exactly with Admiral Melville's specification. An examination of the Coast Survey chart shows, as I stated above, that the depth of the water in front of the navy-yard clear across the channel does not exceed 10 fathoms. The harbor is almost absolutely landlocked, and shipping in the harbor is never disturbed, even during the most violent gales. I have no doubt but that each member of Congress has received a card upon which is printed an editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle of Friday, February 7, 1902, entitled "Puget Sound bamboozling Congress." This editorial charges that we are endeavoring to build up Bremerton Navy-Yard at the expense of Mare Island. This is absolutely untrue. We are not making a fight upon any place. We depend upon our own advantages, and do not desire to build up by tearing down others. As a matter of fact, the fight has been waged by the other fellow, and I have no doubt but that he is stimulated by the progress we are making and from the fact that our advantages and superiority are becoming known to members of Congress. In this editorial the following appears:

The superiority of Mare Island Navy-Yard over any point of Puget Sound can not be questioned. Whoever heard of a ship being wrecked in Mare Island waters during any kind of weather? It would not be prudent to ask that question as to Puget Sound. Seattle and other Sound ports furnished the country very recently with the spectacle of ships wrecking themselves at their wharves during one of those gales which they are liable to experience at almost any season of the year. They have, in fact, not yet recovered from the effects of the late storm which swept the waters of the Sound.

Right here we recall the old saying that "those who live in glass houses should not throw stones," for the ink had hardly dried on this editorial when the following appeared in the Washington Post of February 26, not as an editorial, but as an item of news, and no doubt sent out by the Associated Press:

SAN FRANCISCO, February 25.

One of the heaviest southwest storms that has been experienced in many years struck this city this morning. The wind attained great velocity, blowing 45 miles an hour in the city, while at Point Reyes it reached 60 miles at 7:30 o'clock. Ships dragged their anchors or broke their moorings at their docks, a fishing boat was capsized, the telephone and electric wires were down, and awnings, shade trees, and fences were wrecked, and pedestrians were greatly inconvenienced.

Telegraphic communication with the outside world was cut off. The full force of the storm was felt on the bay, and the bar was so rough that vessels were unable to leave port.

North of the ferries craft of all sorts were tossed about like egg shells. The violent south wind stirred the bay into a rolling, tempestuous sea, against which anchors were almost futile. Swell after swell, each apparently heavier than the one preceding, pounded the vessels from the southerly direction and sent them drifting in dangerous proximity to one another, drove them close to the piers and to the islands, and kept the towboats busily engaged in efforts to prevent disaster.

TRANSPORT AT STORM'S MERCY.

The transport Solace, with nothing but 300 tons of coal to keep her down, broke from her anchorage off Beale street and careened about the bay like a drunken sailor. She drifted broadside on until a collision with the Government steamer Albatross seemed imminent, but she veered off in the nick of time. The wind and the swell caused her to drift helplessly, sending her finally toward the transport wharf at Folsom street. The officers of the service gathered on the pier, fully expecting the Solace to crash into the wharf. Fortunately, the direction of the swell carried the transport around until she just cleared the buffer and swung out into the stream.

The transports Hancock and Rosecrans, which arrived from Manila last night, remained in the stream. No effort was made to land their passengers.

The San Francisco light-ship, No. 70, located 7 miles from Point Lobos, parted her moorings during the height of the storm and was soon drifting toward the harbor, which she finally made. At the time she went astray the wind was blowing at the rate of 70 miles an hour. Three three-story houses were blown down in the Mission district.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any idea where this vast amount of misinformation comes from with reference to Puget Sound and Mare Island?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, I could not say about that. This card, I think, was sent out by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. DAYTON. Does the gentleman know what that organization is; of what it is composed?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, I do not say that this windstorm touched the Mare Island Navy-Yard, or affected the shipping there, but I have just as much right to say it as the San Francisco Chronicle had to conclude that any storm we might have on Puget Sound would affect our navy-yard. We do not deny that we have storms on Puget Sound. I doubt, however, if we have them as often as they do on San Francisco Bay. We do not have them at all seasons of the year, as charged in this editorial. In fact, we have them but seldom. We did have a severe storm there the 1st of January, but its severity was felt only along the main channels of the sound and did not affect the harbor at our navy-yard, as will be seen from this simple statement from a letter received by me from the commandant of that yard under date of January 28, 1902, and before this editorial was written. This is the statement:

I suppose you have seen in the papers about the blizzard here. A good deal of damage was done in all the sound cities except here, where not a cent's worth of damage was done to any vessel or anything else on the water front. Small rowboats took men from the yard in smooth water, and the harbor was smooth, being sheltered by the surrounding hills. It was a strong illustration of what a perfect harbor is.

This is certainly a very complete answer to this charge.

There is abundance of room on the Pacific coast for two navy-yards, the distance being from eight to nine hundred miles between Puget Sound and San Francisco. There is and should be no fight between us and Mare Island, and there will be none, unless they begin it. We will not misrepresent them; we will not even refer to some matters of truth, if they stop misrepresenting us. We will present our advantages without any reflection upon them. Let them present theirs. We invite and welcome personal investigation upon the part of the officers of the Government and visits from members of Congress, feeling that every visit will make us warm and enthusiastic friends in the future as in the past.

Second. A favorable position with regard to the principal lines of defense.

No more favorable position could be found than ours. The principal line of defense is at Port Townsend, 50 or 60 miles down the sound from our location, and is almost impregnable.

Third. A local security from water attack, due to position and natural surroundings.

This yard is absolutely impregnable. It can not be attacked with any degree of success by dash or bombardment. As I have said, the entrances to it are narrow and can be easily mined. The outer defense is almost impregnable, but even if this should be passed by an enemy's vessels, the fortifications at the entrance to the channels leading directly to Sinclair Inlet, together with mines, would render their passage impossible, and without entering the harbor vessels could not approach nearer than 7 or 8 miles to the harbor. They would then have to bombard it as an unseen object, with high hills intervening, and at the same time be subjected to the plunging fire from batteries on the surrounding hills, not more than 2 miles away.

As the commission states in its report, Port Orchard, or Sinclair Inlet "is the citadel of Puget Sound. More favorable conditions of position and natural surroundings against naval attack under the supposition that the principal line of defense to Puget Sound being forced can rarely be found."

Fourth. Ample water frontage of sufficient depth and permanence, and with currents of moderate rapidity.

The frontage on Sinclair Inlet is a mile and a half long, with sufficient depth for the largest vessels afloat. This, with the water front on the entrance to Dyes Inlet—which can be used for lighter vessels—gives a water frontage of 6¼ miles. In Sinclair Inlet there is practically no current. Instead of an ebb and flow tidal current there is simply a rise and fall of the water.

Fifth. A favorable position with respect to the lines of interior communication (by rail or otherwise) with the principal sources of supplies.

The position of the yard in this respect is not at the present time as good as desired. It is on the west shore of the sound and communication with the principal sources of supplies must be by water. This is a very slight inconvenience, the distance from Seattle being only about 15 miles, and boats ply regularly between the yard and Seattle. This inconvenience is common to many other yards. The yard is on the mainland, however, and the prospects of railroad communication in the near future are most excellent.

Sixth. That the character of the ground shall be suitable for the construction of excavated docks and basins and for heavy structures.

Experience has demonstrated that this yard possesses this requirement in a remarkable degree. Since the completion of its dry dock there have been docked the battle ships Oregon, Iowa, and Wisconsin, together with many other smaller vessels, and the dock has not varied in depth the one-thousandth part of an inch. I doubt if this record can be equaled by any other dock in the country. The Oregon has been docked here two or three times, and the Iowa has been in the dock an equal number of times. These trials have demonstrated beyond cavil or question the perfection of our site in these particulars.

Seventh. Proximity to centers of labor and supplies of material.

Within 30 miles there is a population of about 250,000 people from which labor can be drawn. Seattle, with her 100,000 people, is within an hour's ride, and Tacoma, with 50,000 people, is within two hours' ride. We have no trouble about securing labor, and that too, of the very highest order.

I notice that Admiral Melville, in his testimony, says: "Mare Island has one great advantage, however; it is near a great city where you can get mechanics." There are almost 200,000 people as near our yard as the city of San Francisco is to Mare Island. When I visited our yard last summer there were over 3,000 applications for work on file. There is, and will be, no trouble whatever about labor. So far as supplies of material are concerned, we probably are better located than any other point on the Pacific coast. The yard is in the very heart of the largest and best lumber forests in the United States. Coal is found in abundance in near-by mines. Three transcontinental lines have access to Puget Sound, so that our communication with Eastern points is first class.

Eighth. Healthfulness of the climate and its suitability for out-of-door labor.

Our climate can not be surpassed in the world either for healthfulness or outdoor work. Many think that our climate is very severe. No greater mistake than this, however, could be made. The warm Japan current tempers our winters and the ocean breezes temper our summers. Comparing Seattle—and this will apply to our navy-yard—with Washington City, we find that last year the minimum temperature at Seattle was 28° above zero, while the minimum temperature for Washington City was 7° above zero. The maximum temperature last year at Seattle was 87° above zero, while the maximum for Washington City was 102° above zero. I will submit with my remarks a statement showing the maximum and minimum temperatures of Seattle and Washington City during each month of the year 1901, from which will appear at a glance the character of our climate, summer and winter. Many, too, have the idea that we have a great deal of rain on the sound. I shall submit a statement showing the amount of rainfall at Seattle from 1892 to 1901, inclusive, giving the monthly rainfall and the total yearly rainfall, which is much less than that of Washington City.

The total number of cloudy days at Seattle in 1901 was 119; at Washington City, 148. The cloudy days at Seattle were 150 and at Washington City 121; partly cloudy at Seattle 96, and at Washington City 96. Days on which it rained at Seattle, 152; Washington City, 110.

In the summer men can labor all day long without any inconvenience, and the nights are cool, thus insuring refreshing sleep, "tired nature's sweet restorer." It is the general opinion that the winter months are really the most healthful of the year. It therefore would appear that the Government can get more for its money by way of labor than at any of its navy-yards on the Atlantic coast.

Ninth. The existence in the vicinity of an ample supply of good, potable water.

This requirement is well met at this yard. An official measurement shows the supply of water to be over 800,000 gallons per day. In addition to the present supply, Lake Kitsap is located about 3 miles away and its waters can be brought to the yard at very slight expense. I venture the assertion that there is no yard in the United States that comes more nearly complying fully with the many requirements for a suitable site for a navy-yard than does that on Puget Sound. I desire to submit some of the testimony given before the Naval Committee.

Admiral Kenney was asked this question by Mr. Dayton:

What is your opinion in regard to Puget Sound? Is it not calculated as the best station on the coast?

Admiral KENNEY. It is the best station in the world, and has every natural advantage.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It has splendid water?

Admiral KENNEY. Magnificent water, and is perfectly protected. Everybody who has been out there is delighted with the place, and they say that the Almighty Himself could not have planned a better location than that.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Are there any conditions that surround it that are not favorable?

Admiral KENNEY. I never heard of any.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do those general fogs that occur there interfere in any way?

Admiral KENNEY. I think not.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Some portions of that coast have a regular fog every day?

Admiral KENNEY. I never heard it mentioned.

It will surprise our people to know that "there are portions of our coast where they have regular fogs every day." We certainly have not explored that coast yet, and I believe that it would be very difficult to convince some of the members of Congress who had the pleasure of visiting Puget Sound last year that we even have any rain there. If Mr. LOUDENSLAGER will only visit us this summer we will convince him of his error. We have some fogs, it is true, but none to cause us any trouble or inconvenience. The following statement was given by Admiral Melville, who has personally visited and inspected our navy-yard:

Mr. DAYTON. You visited that plant last year. Would you kindly give us your impression of the conditions of Puget Sound, and the possibilities of that station, and its importance?

Admiral MELVILLE. From a strategic point of view I think it is the most important on the Pacific coast. It is close to the English possessions, and they have a big naval station at Esquimalt. It is well in from the sea, there is deep water in all directions, and it is easily defended. Fortunately, the gulf stream of Japan keeps the water warm. A great many people have a mistaken idea about that. They are under the impression that everything freezes up, but it is not so. It is the shortest line for navigation between the United States, China, Japan, and the East Indies.

Mr. DAYTON. Is it closer to Alaska?

Admiral MELVILLE. Yes; it is right near Alaska.

Mr. DAYTON. What is your impression about the expenditure of money there?

Admiral MELVILLE. I think it is one of the best expenditures of money made anywhere. These works are laid out nicely. No work has been done there which will have to be done over, as has been the case at some places.

Mr. DAYTON. It is economical?

Admiral MELVILLE. For some time to come it will probably be necessary to keep the largest number of our war ships on the Pacific Ocean. There is work for the war ships to do, patrolling the Bering Sea, surveying around the Hawaiian Islands, and patrolling the islands of the Philippines. We should therefore have two navy-yards on the Pacific coast, for an exigency might arise when the shops at both places will be of great military importance. Millions of dollars have been spent at Mare Island, and now the yard is getting in pretty good shape. To keep the Mare Island establishment up to modern requirements more money will have to be spent there. There is an immediate necessity, however, to build up the Puget Sound station. These stations are several hundred miles apart, and each will have a work to do.

The demands of each establishment are independent of the other. By having two navy-yard plants on the Pacific coast a friendly and spirited rivalry may be created between them, which may result in good to the naval service. I am rather inclined to believe that it would be good policy to send some of our ships from Asia to the Pacific coast whenever they required extensive repairs. The journey across the ocean would accustom the crews to seagoing conditions, and the time would by no means be lost that would be taken in making the journey. If such policy were inaugurated, there would be plenty of work for both dockyards, and the large amount of money now expended at the English dockyards would then be expended at home.

The channel at Mare Island is rather narrow and sometimes you can not turn a ship around. Mare Island has one great advantage, however; it is near a great city, where you can get mechanics.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Vessels can turn around lower down?

Admiral MELVILLE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Has not that channel been filling up?

Admiral MELVILLE. Yes; that has been brought about by the hydraulic work in the mines above, at Sacramento.

The CHAIRMAN. What boat did we use when we were going up there?

Admiral MELVILLE. It was the McCullough, drawing about 18 feet.

The CHAIRMAN. They were sounding all the way up.

Admiral MELVILLE. They always do that as a matter of protection. Any navigator, whether merchantman or naval, even if he knows the shore, will do that, because if he meets with an accident the question will be asked, "Did you use the lead?" He might strike a rock, and if he did not keep his lead down it would be considered reprehensible.

Mr. DAYTON. That is not the case through Puget Sound.

Admiral MELVILLE. No.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you have any idea of the depth of the channel there?

Admiral MELVILLE. No, sir; there is difficulty at Puget Sound, because they can not anchor there. It is too deep. It is not safe to anchor in more than 25 fathoms of water. A modern sailor does not like to anchor in more than 10 fathoms, or 60 feet.

Mr. DAYTON. Did you examine the dry docks at Puget Sound?

Admiral MELVILLE. They are elegant dry docks.

Mr. DAYTON. They will accommodate the largest vessels?

Admiral MELVILLE. The largest on the Pacific coast.

Mr. DAYTON. Such as the Wisconsin and Oregon?

Admiral MELVILLE. They were sent there to have their keels put in because there was no other dry dock on the Pacific coast to put them in. That was before we got our shops going. I think it is the consensus of opinion in the Navy, from the Secretary down, that we ought to build up that station. My own opinion about Mare Island is simply to complete our present plans there. It would be a good place to take small ships, but that navy-yard should be put in first-class condition in every respect.

Mr. DAYTON. I was impressed with the advantage of Puget Sound or Bremerton. It impressed itself strongly on my mind because the water ran deep near the shore and there was no necessity for sea walls.

Admiral MELVILLE. That is right; but we must have wharves. We can not lay a ship alongside of the beach.

Mr. DAYTON. You can run out piling?

Admiral MELVILLE. Yes. My idea is that will be one of the greatest stations we have.

Relative to this yard Admiral O'Neil testified as follows:

Mr. DAYTON. Have you any opinion as to the value of that yard?

Admiral O'NEIL. It is a very promising place and likely to become one of great importance.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it desirable?

Admiral O'NEIL. Very.

Mr. BUTLER. Has it good water?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes; and a very fine site. It has a fine climate. It is well located and requires no dredging. It is an ideal spot for a navy-yard.

Mr. DAYTON. The Puget Sound Navy-Yard will make the finest in the world, although it might be enlarged, because it was started too small.

I am rejoiced that the Naval Committee recognizes the importance and the advantages of our navy-yard, and think they have been most liberal in the present bill in providing for its development. It has been neglected in the past because its importance and advantages were not known and realized. For every dollar expended at this yard the Government will receive a dollar in return. The total appropriations for the yard up to and including 1901 were $1,643,663.59. This includes the appropriation for the establishment of the yard and the building of the dry dock. From 1890 to 1901, inclusive, there has been expended at the New York Navy-Yard $15,253,091.33, and the yard was established long before 1890.

At Philadelphia the expenditures for the same period have been $5,701,481.96. At Norfolk, Va., the expenditures have been $6,512,763.77; at Boston, $4,854,038.15, and at Portsmouth, N. H., $2,747,597.24. At each of these places the expenditures have been many times the total amount appropriated for our yard, including its original cost and the original cost of the dock. It must be remembered that all these yards were provided for long before 1890, and these amounts have been appropriations for their improvement and maintenance alone. The only yard, aside from ours, for which I have secured the total appropriations since, and including the establishment thereof, is Mare Island, and the total appropriations for this yard since its establishment in 1854 have been the sum of $17,419,805.24. The value of the real estate, chattels, and machinery plant at Mare Island on June 30, 1901, was for real estate and chattels, $5,387,301.86, and for machinery, $660,146.49. At our yard the value of the real estate and chattels on said date was $941,993.80, and of the machinery, $255,122.21. These figures need no comment from me.

As I have said, our dry dock has proved to be one of the most valuable and successful in the country. It has been tested many times by the heaviest battle ships afloat. These tests have been withstood perfectly, and practically no repairs have been required. Its cost as compared with the cost of most of our other docks is remarkably low, as will appear from the following statement furnished me by the Navy Department, to which I invite the careful attention of the members of this House:

Cost or contract price of docks, United States Navy.

	No. of dock.	Material of construction.	Length.	Cost or contract price.
			Ft. In.

Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the policy of this committee. I believe in building up the naval establishment of this country, especially the navy-yards and the Navy itself. The country is in favor of this policy, and any advance will be hailed with delight throughout the nation. We want a strong and powerful navy. In my judgment, and in this I speak for myself alone, we should have a navy the equal, if not the superior, of any nation on earth, England not excepted. Our position in the world's affairs to-day demands this. I do not agree entirely with those who date our being a world power from the Spanish war.

We were a world power before that. Our wonderful growth and development had placed us in the front rank of nations. We held our own immense market and were invading the world's markets in every quarter, and the nations of the earth had begun to recognize us as a factor that must be reckoned with so far as commercial and trade relations were concerned. As a political power and world factor we were not of the first rank; in fact, we were but little considered. From this standpoint we were sneered at, and it was expected in many quarters that we would suffer severe loss in our war with Spain, though our ultimate success was admitted. That war opened the eyes of all nations, and since its conclusion we are considered in the world's politics as never before. We are in the arena of the world's politics whether we will or no. Our flag is respected everywhere. The day of isolation is gone, and in its stead are great and weighty questions to be faced and solved. We must do our part in the world's great battle of progress and civilization.

We hope no war will come to us. The greatest conservator of peace is to be prepared for war. On the land we are ready. We do not need a great standing army. Twenty-five thousand regulars are enough in this country to-day, leaving out the Philippine matter. The bulwark of our defense on the land is that great body of sturdy yeomanry, the volunteers, that has shown itself equal to the greatest trial that can come to any nation. On the land we can defy the world and conquer. On the sea we have no defense except what we may provide. We must not invite attack by our weakness. We have possessions that are most inviting to other nations. They would be the first and probably the only object of attack in case of war, and however much some may desire to get rid of these possessions, there are none who would not resist to the last any attempt of another nation to take them by force. We may wish to give them up, but we will not have them taken from us. To guarantee our own security, to be sure of solving these problems in our own way and in our own time, we should be in a position on the sea that none will dare attack.

It will be money well spent if we do nothing more than place our flag in every port of the world, even though it may be on a warship on a peaceful mission. Every ship flying the Stars and Stripes in a foreign port is an agent for and a promoter of American commerce, civilization, and government. It carries at its masthead the insignia of that virile civilization that has sprung up in the Westland, the product of all that is best and strongest in the Old World; and in the waving folds of its red, white, and blue the poor, oppressed, and liberty loving of every race and clime see a beckoning hand inviting them from poverty to plenty, from distress to happiness, from tyranny to freedom, from despotic to representative government.

A standing army may be the instrument in the hands of a tyrant to oppress, the navy never. It has never endangered nor assailed the rights of a people. In the history of nations it has been their bulwark. From the time that Xerxes sat on the hills overlooking the Hellespont and saw his fleet destroyed by the navy of Greece until the present day navies have been the saviors of their governments instead of their destroyers. Athens' strength was in her navy. Rome conquered Carthage through the superiority of her triremes. England's glory and England's power and England's supremacy have been and are in her navies.

Our own history is emblazoned with the heroic actions and brilliant victories of our Navy. Though small, its achievements have lightened the gloom of defeat and revived the waning fires of national hopes in almost every war in which we have been engaged. John Paul Jones startled the world with his great victory in the English Channel in the very shadow of Flamborough Head and revived the drooping spirits of the American revolutionists. With the gloom of defeat shadowing our land like a pall in the war of 1812, and the ashes of the national capital bespeaking our dire extremity, the unsurpassed heroism and achievements of Hull, Bainbridge, Decatur, Perry, and Lawrence wrested the laurel of supremacy from the "mistress of the seas" and brought an honorable peace and everlasting renown to our flag.

In that fearful struggle, which tested to the utmost the timbers of the ship of state, the Navy on each side maintained its brilliant record, and history records the fact that at the opportune time the little Monitor won its victory over the Merrimac, the far-reaching effect of which never will be known. Of the war with Spain I need say nothing. Manila and Dewey, Schley and Santiago! These are names written in imperishable light on the pages of our country's history and tell us of victories without a parallel in the world's naval warfare.

I hope to see the day when the American flag shall fly at the masthead of an American ship in every port of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. I suggest that the gentleman on the other side [Mr. MEYER of Louisiana] use some of his time.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has but fifty-five minutes to yield.

Mr. FOSS. I will yield enough additional time to make an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana yields fifty-five minutes and the gentleman from Illinois five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER], who is recognized for one hour.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to occupy the entire hour which has been allotted to me. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following article.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the article will be read from the Clerk's desk. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOT EVEN WOMEN, CHILDREN, AND BABES SPARED.

[By Corpl. Richard O'Brien, Company M, Twenty-sixth Volunteers.]

It was on the 27th of December, the anniversary of my birth, and I shall never forget the scenes I witnessed on that day. As we approached the town the word passed along the line that there would be no prisoners taken. It meant that we were to shoot every living thing in sight—man, woman, or child.

The first shot was fired by the then first sergeant of our company. His target was a mere boy, who was coming down the mountain path into the town astride of a carabao. The boy was not struck by the bullet, but that was not the sergeant's fault. The little Filipino boy slid from the back of his carabao and fled in terror up the mountain side. Half a dozen shots were fired after him.

The shooting now had attracted the villagers, who came out of their homes in alarm, wondering what it all meant. They offered no offense, did not display a weapon, made no hostile movement whatsoever, but they were ruthlessly shot down in cold blood, men, women, and children. The poor natives huddled together or fled in terror. Many were pursued and killed on the spot.

Two old men, bearing a white flag and clasping hands like two brothers, approached the lines. Their hair was white. They fairly tottered, they were so feeble under the weight of years. To my horror and that of the other men in the command, the order was given to fire, and the two old men were shot down in their tracks. We entered the village. A man who had been on a sick bed appeared at the doorway of his home. He received a bullet in the abdomen and fell dead in the doorway. Dumdum bullets were used in that massacre, but we were not told the name of the bullets. We didn't have to be told. We knew what they were.

In another part of the village a mother with a babe at her breast and two young children at her side pleaded for mercy. She feared to leave her home which had just been fired—accidentally, I believe. She faced the flames with her children, and not a hand was raised to save her or the little ones. They perished miserably. It was sure death if she left the house—it was sure death if she remained. She feared the American soldiers, however, worse than the devouring flames.

Corpl. RICHARD O'BRIEN.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, the statements made by Corporal O'Brien are so utterly abhorrent to the sentiments of human nature that, if they be true, they brand with indelible shame the name of our country. I am not able to say whether those statements are true or false, but the author of them ought to be brought here and cross-examined. Considering that the charge there made, together with other similar charges, are of such a serious nature, I wrote to the editor of the Irish World, in whose paper the article is printed, and asked him to inform me whether or not the statements were known to have been made by Corporal O'Brien; in other words, as to the genuineness of the publication. In reply I received this letter from Patrick Ford, editor of the Irish World, one of the largest publications in the United States, a weekly paper having, possibly, as large a circulation as any in the United States, and one of the greatest champions of human liberty on this continent. Mr. Ford wrote me as follows:

NEW YORK, May 12, 1902.

Hon. W. D. VANDIVER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter with reference to Mr. O'Brien's statements is received. These statements first appeared in the New York World, and I believe them to be genuine. I have had a private interview with Mr. O'Brien in which he affirmed all that he had charged. He can not well go to Washington, but is quite willing to make a sworn statement regarding those matters and forward the same, if desirable.

Mr. PALMER. To what company and regiment did this man belong?

Mr. VANDIVER. Company M, Twenty-sixth Volunteers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for bringing this matter to the attention of the House at this time. You may say it has nothing to do with the bill pending before the House. So it has not; but we are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if matters of this kind may be considered anywhere in the world or at any time, it seems to me that they may be considered under this head.

But, furthermore, I have another reason for bringing them to the attention of this House at this time. It will probably not be three weeks before the Philippine civil government bill will be reported to this House. That bill will be brought into this House and (if we are to judge the future by the past) will be rushed through—railroaded through—without an opportunity of fair discussion, without an opportunity even of stating the facts regarding the situation in the Philippine Islands. I therefore take advantage of this opportunity of mentioning a few of the facts as to what is going on over there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is any member in this House who assumes to be the champion of this Administration or the apologist for the deeds done by soldiers wearing American uniforms in the Philippine Islands I challenge him to this investigation.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. VANDIVER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not rise as the special advocate of the Administration, although I am in perfect harmony with its policy in the Philippines, but the purpose for which I rise is simply to inquire if there is anyone on that side of the Chamber who is ready to defend the atrocities committed by the Filipinos upon the American soldiers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. VANDIVER. No, sir. I shall not defend atrocities on mankind, whether committed by the heathens or the so-called Christians wearing the uniform of the American soldier. But, now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does this soldier state that he was obeying orders? When that is done, privates have no right to do so without directions, and if they do that they are obeying their orders. That is my knowledge of war.

Mr. VANDIVER. If the statement is true it must have been done by orders—orders passed down the line he says that no prisoners were to be taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who gave the order?

Mr. VANDIVER. He does not say. I will hand the article in to be printed in my remarks, and the gentleman can read it in full. I think Mr. O'Brien should be put on the stand under oath.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, the statements of facts are so horrible that I am loath to credit them. I am not yet willing to believe that all that is said in that article can be true. But I want to say, furthermore, that if there were no other facts within the range of certain knowledge that have been demonstrated and proven to be true and that are worse than even this enormity I would at once brand the article as a falsehood. But I have before me documentary evidence, official reports, from American soldiers under the direction of the War Department, who have testified to scenes even more horrible than that which this soldier narrates, and I am obliged to admit the shameful truth which they tell. I desire to read, Mr. Chairman, a portion of the report of Cornelius Gardener, major of the Thirteenth Infantry of the United States Army, provincial civil governor of the province of Tayabas, in the Philippine Islands, said report having been made to his superior officer, the civil governor of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PALMER. What do you read from—what page?

Mr. VANDIVER. I read from page 884.

Mr. PALMER. Of what book?

Mr. VANDIVER. An official document entitled "Affairs in the Philippine Islands," this report having upon it the date of December 16, 1901.

First, Major Gardener proceeds to explain that a very friendly sentiment had existed among many of the inhabitants and better classes of the inhabitants of that province, but that it was fast dying out on account of cruelties of American soldiers, and he says:

Of late, by reason of the conduct of the troops, such as the extensive burning of barrios in trying to lay waste the country so that the insurgents can not occupy it, the torturing of natives by so-called "water cure" and other methods in order to obtain information, the harsh treatment of natives generally, and the failure of inexperienced, lately appointed lieutenants commanding posts to distinguish between those who are friendly and those unfriendly and treating every native as if he were, whether or no, an insurrecto at heart, this favorable sentiment above referred to is being fast destroyed and a deep hatred toward us engendered. If these things need be done they had best be done by native troops, so that the people of the United States will not be credited therewith.

Almost without exception soldiers, and also many officers, refer to the natives in their presence as "niggers," and the natives are beginning to understand what the word "nigger" means.

The course now being pursued in this province and in the provinces of Batangas, Laguna, and Samar is, in my opinion, sowing the seeds for a perpetual revolution, or at least preparing the people of these provinces to rise up in revolution against us hereafter whenever a good opportunity offers.

* * * * * * *

The attitude of the Army, thereby meaning most of the officers and soldiers—

Officers and soldiers both, mind you—is, however, decidedly hostile to the provincial and municipal government in this province and to civil government in these islands in general. In Manila especially it is intensely so, even among the higher officers. The work of the Commission in the establishment of provincial governments is ridiculed, even in presence of the natives. It is openly stated that the Army should remain in charge for the next twenty years. Outrages committed by officers and soldiers against natives in an organized municipality and province, when reported by the presidente or governor to the military authorities—are often not punished. This, in my opinion, is unfortunate, because loyal natives begin to fear that local self-government promised them will not last long, and that any slight disturbance in a province may at any time be made the pretext to again place it under military rule, and this is just the thing the insurgents at heart most desire.

He means the local officer corresponding to our mayor—

It has been stated that a Filipino or any Oriental does not appreciate just or kindly treatment and that he considers it an evidence of weakness, and that severe and harsh measures are the only ones that are permanently effective with Filipinos. I have found that just and kind treatment, uniform and continued, is the only way by which these people can be made permanently our friends and satisfied with United States sovereignty.

Having been stationed six years on the Rio Grande, I am well acquainted with the natives of the State of Tamaulipas, Mexico, and while stationed in the province of Santa Clara, Cuba, I visited every town in that province and was able to observe the intelligence and education there. I believe that the people of Tayabas Province are in every way superior in education, intelligence, morals, and civilization to the people of Tamaulipas or Santa Clara.

But I have not time to read it all. He concludes by saying that, owing to this cruelty and burning of the homes of the natives, even friendly and peaceable natives, the American sentiment in the island is rapidly declining. I commend to the members of the House a careful reading of Major Gardener's report. Remember, he is our own governor of that province and an officer highly commended by his superiors in command. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I would like to ask him whether he has read the entire statement of Major Gardener.

Mr. VANDIVER. I have read all the parts bearing on that subject, and I am willing, if my time can be extended, to read every word in it. I will give the report to the gentleman from Michigan and ask him to read the whole of it in his own time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is the gentleman from Missouri familiar with his entire statement?

Mr. VANDIVER. I am.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is not it a fact that he does not specify in but one instance, and that relates to the manner of salutation?

Mr. VANDIVER. No, sir; that is not a fact. I have not time to yield for extended remarks, but I will say that I would be glad if the gentleman from Michigan will take up the subject and explain it the best he can in his own time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Missouri does not wish to misrepresent Major Gardener?

Mr. VANDIVER. I have not misrepresented Major Gardener.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman knows that he makes no general assault on the conduct of the Army there.

Mr. VANDIVER. Does not the gentleman call the paragraph that I have read a pretty severe criticism?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, call it no assault or what you please, it seems to me to be a pretty serious criticism of the American soldiers and officers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will say this, that in no instance except one, so far as I am familiar, does Major Gardener make a specific charge regarding the bad conduct of our soldiers.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan, as he seems to know something about this case, that he ought to know that minority members of the Senate committee have insisted on bringing Major Gardener before that committee, and the majority do not seem to want him.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not know that that is the case.

Mr. VANDIVER. The gentleman must know that some members of the Senate committee have insisted on bringing him there in order to testify, and they are expecting to have him there.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am sure the gentleman from Missouri does not wish to make that statement.

Mr. VANDIVER. I have made it and I stand by it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The Senate committee has not asked for the presence of Major Gardener.

Mr. VANDIVER. I said certain members of the Senate committee. The gentleman from Michigan knows very well that the majority has not acted on the suggestion, and the probability is that they do not want him there. He would probably tell too much.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I think the Senate committee has concluded not to have him here. I know Major Gardener very well, and I regard him as a brave and gallant soldier, entirely worthy of belief in any matter coming to his personal knowledge; but in this matter he may rely on the statements of others, and yet his honesty can not be questioned by anyone, although I do not think he has intended to criticise our Army or its operations in the Philippines.

Mr. VANDIVER (interrupting). Then the gentleman from Michigan is not able to discover in the paragraph I have read a thing in Major Gardener's remarks that reflects upon the conduct of our soldiers?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman charge that?

Mr. VANDIVER. Is not the gentleman from Michigan willing to admit, after all Major Gardener's experience in Mexico and Cuba, and now for more than three years in the Philippine Islands, that he is prepared to make a general statement—a statement of general facts relating to the province of which he is the governor, after he has traveled all over it, he says, with no protection but a native guide?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am willing to admit that Major Gardener is an efficient soldier and entirely worthy of belief, although he may rely upon the imagination of others in some instances.

Mr. VANDIVER. You can put it that way if you please. I have read what he says are the facts. Furthermore, I will put in the RECORD a subsequent statement of Major Gardener, and you will see whether he makes any specifications or not. I have not time to read it, but will print it right here, and the House may see whether or not it is a sufficient answer to the gentleman from Michigan.

ARMY ATROCITIES IN TAYABAS.

WASHINGTON, May 6, 1902.

When the Philippine Committee met to-day Senator LODGE presented a cablegram from General Chaffee giving the charges and specifications of Major Gardener relative to Tayabas Province. The cablegram was received at the War Department May 4, and is as follows:

Reference to cable 3d, Secretary of War, to send the following: Major Cornelius Gardener's first letter contained no specifications on which I could act. From his second letter, however, in order to comply with the present instructions, I submit, in the form of charges, the following data, which are as complete as possible under the conditions in which I am at present situated.

Charge.—The troops that succeeded the Volunteers did not keep up the scouting and patroling system.

Specifications.—That the troops stationed in the central towns on Tayabas, to wit, in Lucban, Tayabas, Lucena, and Saviayo, did, in the spring of 1901, for about three months fail to scout or patrol the country except as escort to wagon trains on the main roads.

Charge.—Burning of barrios or villages.

Specification.—That troops during the fall of 1901 burned a number of barrios belonging to Dolores and adjacent towns.

Specification 1.—That certain United States troops coming from San Pablo, in or near the town of Dolores, tortured a native by the water cure. This was during the summer of 1901.

Specification 2.—That the commanding officer of Laguimanoc during the summer of 1901 tortured or maltreated a native boy.

Specification 3.—That the troops coming from Lucena or Tayabas on several occasions tortured natives belonging to the pueblo of Pagbilao. This during the summer and fall of 1901.

Charge.—Harsh treatment of natives.

Specification 1.—That men belonging to a detachment of soldiers stationed at Candelaria looted a store in that town about the month of November, 1901.

Specification 2.—That a detachment of troops took away from a peaceful citizen of Dolores a pony. This about the month of September, 1901.

Specification 3.—That the house of a native of Candelaria was forcibly taken for a smallpox hospital and afterwards burned by order of the surgeon at Sariaya; that the said native was not remunerated. This in Candelaria in July, 1901.

Specification 4.—That First Lieut. George G. Catlin did strike with his fist natives of Lucena for failing to take off their hats to him, and did forcibly with threats compel a native to deal cards for him. This about September, 1901.

Specification 5.—That First Lieut. George De G. Catlin at Calanauan did keep in the guardhouse for three days a native without food or water. This about September, 1901.

Specification 6.—That First Lieut. George De G. Catlin did strike natives in the face for failing to remove their hats. This while he was in command at the post.

Specification 7.—That a party of soldiers attacked with pistols three natives working on the roads near Lucena. This about November, 1901.

Specification 8.—That certain soldiers belonging to a troop of cavalry stationed in Tayabas, Pueblo, did attack five women of that town. This in the month of January or February, 1901.

The dates are approximate, and the facts from complaints made to me, stated to the best of my recollection.

CHAFFEE.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further, because there are other facts I want to present, and there will be ample time, if gentlemen on the other side want to, to discuss the whole matter. In the documents on my desk there is evidence piling up mountain high of cruelty, torture, murder, robbery, rape, and every other crime known to the calendar, practiced on noncombatants, old men, prisoners, women, and children.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Committed by the Filipinos?

Mr. VANDIVER. By men wearing the American soldier's uniform, under control of American officers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not believe it, and I hurl the statement back and challenge the gentleman to produce the evidence.

Mr. VANDIVER. I will produce it if you will give me time. I will produce scores and hundreds of cases.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman certainly does not intend to make an assault on the American Army.

Mr. VANDIVER. I make no assault; but wait till I am through and see whether I ought to criticise them or not.

I say that you ought not to justify crime and barbarity, whether committed by the Army or by the people you are trying to conquer.

I say to the gentleman that my pride in the name of America and the American Republic is greater than his, but my pride in the fact that I am a human being and still have sentiments of human nature in me is greater even than my pride in the American Army.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. On what do you base your general charge against our Army in the Philippines?

Mr. VANDIVER. On specific and numerous cases amply proven; not against the whole Army, but a large section of it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Name your cases.

Mr. VANDIVER. I will name the cases, if the gentleman will sit down and listen.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Just name your case.

Mr. VANDIVER. All right; I will give you cases enough before I get through.

Mr. Chairman, I will read from the investigation of Inspector-General Maj. John S. Mallory, who was ordered by the War Department to investigate the charges made against the officers and men of the Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, who were charged with having cruelly shot down prisoners who had surrendered to them. This testimony was taken before a subcommittee of the Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate, while there was pending in the Senate, as I understand, a nomination of Wilder S. Metcalf, who was a major in that regiment, to be pension agent at Topeka, Kans.

Mr. PALMER. Where is that published? Is it a Senate document?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Please give us the number, will you?

Mr. HAMILTON. From what document is the gentleman from Missouri reading?

Mr. VANDIVER. I am reading from the hearings before the Senate committee, page 11.

A few days after the Caloocan fight—

I am reading now from the testimony of Corpl. Lawrence L. Bradley, Company M, Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, who, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

A few days after the Caloocan fight I heard Captain Bishop talking about what should be done with prisoners. He said: "Now, there was Company I with prisoners. It seemed a hard thing to do to shoot them, but there was nothing else to do, and I had to give the order." We had been talking about what should be done with prisoners and I heard some had been shot. I have given the substance of what Captain Bishop said, but may not have given his exact words. On the day of the Caloocan fight the word was passed down the line that we were not to take prisoners. The word was passed along our company by privates that the order was we were to take no prisoners.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman is a lawyer——

Mr. VANDIVER. No; I deny the charge that I am a lawyer. Wait till I get through giving the facts in the case.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether he regards what he has read as evidence?

Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield at present. I am reading the testimony.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is only hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am reading from the testimony given by soldiers who were there in the battle.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The witness said he did not see it.

A MEMBER. He says he heard the order passed down the line.

Mr. VANDIVER. I read now from the testimony of Private F. H. Swearingen, Company I, Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, who being duly sworn, testified as I am about to read. This whole article is the report of the inspector-general, Major Mallory himself, who sent this testimony to the War Department. The witness says:

There were two wounded Filipinos crawled out of a trench, which was about 150 yards from the church toward Manila. They were "kinder" waving their hands and making signs as if they wanted to surrender.

Major Metcalf told some of the men to take them back. They were either not able to go or wouldn't go back, and about eight or ten men were being kept there fooling with them, and finally Major Metcalf gave the order to shoot them, and they were shot.

I read further from the testimony of William H. Putnam, Company I, Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, who testifies as to the same particular instance. He says:

Major Metcalf told two of the men to take the prisoners to the rear. They refused to go even when pricked with bayonets. Finally some officer gave the order to shoot them. I was one of the men who shot, but don't know that I hit one of them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. VANDIVER. Wait until I get through with this evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. VANDIVER. I will now read from the testimony of Capt. Charles S. Flanders, who was captain of the company.

Mr. HAMILTON. How long will it take to read that?

Mr. VANDIVER. Only a few minutes.

Two insurgents in the trench threw up their hands as if to surrender. I told them to come out, and they got out of the trench on the opposite side from me. I told two men to take charge of them and either to take them to the rear or to bring them on. Some men of B Company and some of M Company were mixed in with my men. I don't remember who the men were I ordered to take charge of the prisoners. I then went forward, and when I got about 30 or 40 yards away I heard some one say, "Shoot them," or something like that, and I heard reports of guns, and when I turned round they were shot. I don't know who did the shooting or who told them to shoot. I did not investigate the matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the finding of the Inspector-General, who seems to have tried his best to clear the skirts of the officers, he makes this statement himself:

That Capt. Charles F. Flanders, of the Twentieth Kansas, commanding Company I at the time of the Callucan engagement, having detailed two men to take prisoners to the rear, and knowing that the prisoners were not taken to the rear, but, according to his own statement, were shot, was guilty of gross neglect of duty in not investigating the matter or reporting it to a higher authority or in taking no steps whatever to bring the guilty parties to justice.

Now, observe that the inspector-general himself says the prisoners were shot, and the captain was guilty of gross neglect in not investigating the matter. I suppose this fact will not now be denied.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the colonel of that regiment was the brilliant, river-swimming colonel, since a brigadier-general—Funston. He was on that battlefield, only a few hundred yards from where these scenes were taking place. Has General Funston been brought to account for this infamy practiced by his soldiers and never investigated by him? On the contrary, he has been promoted to a brigadier-generalship.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Are you referring to Colonel Metcalf now? He was General Funston's lieutenant-colonel, I suppose.

Mr. VANDIVER. Some of this article refers to Metcalf. But I am referring just now to Colonel Funston.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman knows, does he not, that the Senate Committee on Pensions investigated Mr. Metcalf?

Mr. VANDIVER. What I have just been reading is from the report of that committee.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They investigated the matter and exonerated Metcalf and confirmed him unanimously. The gentleman is dealing in ancient history. [Laughter.] There is no doubt about that. The man has been investigated and he has been confirmed as a pension agent, notwithstanding all these general and loose charges.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am simply giving the facts; I am not locating the responsibility. But Colonel Funston was promoted instead of being investigated and Metcalf has been rewarded by being appointed pension agent at Topeka.

Mr. LANDIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, if the gentleman will just be patient a moment, I will give him some more facts.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman—this man Funston, this river-swimming general, is the same man that captured your old friend Aguinaldo, is he not? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. VANDIVER. I have understood, Mr. Chairman, that Emilio Aguinaldo was a great bugbear to certain gentlemen on the other side of this House. Now, I am not saying anything about Emilio. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] seems to be fond of talking about him, and I will give him plenty of time after I am through to eulogize him or abuse him, as he pleases.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman means.

Mr. LANDIS. The eulogies he has received have come from that side of the House.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be diverted from the straight line of this testimony to discuss matters that have no connection with the facts I am presenting.

Mr. HAMILTON. What was the gentleman reading when he was interrupted?

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I proceed to read further from the testimony taken before the Senate committee in regard to practices of the American soldiers over there, and lest the gentleman may need not only the testimony of eyewitnesses—the testimony of sworn witnesses—I will read him some of the findings of courts of inquiry and court-martial.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] desires to interrupt he shall address the Chair.

Mr. HAMILTON. I did address the Chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I thought I addressed the Chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor.
Mr. HAMILTON. I asked if he would permit an inquiry at this point.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Michigan?
Mr. VANDIVER. Oh, certainly, for a moment.
Mr. HAMILTON. Now, the party to which you belong——
Mr. VANDIVER (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, I see by the clock that I have not much more time, and I will ask the gentleman to hurry with his question.
Mr. HAMILTON. Declares for a stable form of government in the Philippine Islands.
Mr. VANDIVER. I am not going to discuss that.
Mr. HAMILTON. Are you not?
Mr. VANDIVER. Not now.
Mr. HAMILTON. In order to have a stable form of government in the Philippine Islands, would you not have to have soldiers over there—your party?
Mr. VANDIVER. Granting all that, I am not going to discuss that.
Mr. HAMILTON. Is it true that you would have to have soldiers? Answer the question. Is it true? Answer the question I ask you.
Mr. VANDIVER. I am not discussing the question now.
Mr. HAMILTON. Have you not declared for a stable form of government in the Philippine Islands?
Mr. VANDIVER. Suppose I have, what has that got to do with these facts of cruelty and barbarity? Does the gentleman stand here as an apologist for all the inhuman conduct that has been perpetrated over there? [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, no; but could you have a stable form of government without soldiers?
Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield further.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.
Mr. HAMILTON. Would you expect——
Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.
Mr. HAMILTON. Would you expect to recruit your soldiers from Sunday school classes?
Mr. VANDIVER. I am not going to yield for any such purpose as that. But I would not recruit them from savages.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is not in order. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.
Mr. HAMILTON. All right.
Mr. VANDIVER. I will agree, Mr. Chairman, to yield as often and as long as the gentleman wishes to interrogate me, if I can have my time sufficiently extended. Otherwise I will decline to yield further.
Mr. HAMILTON. I should like to have the gentleman's time extended, so that we may several of us interrogate him.
Mr. VANDIVER. Before I get through with these facts you will see other reasons why you would like it, too.
Mr. HANBURY rose.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?
Mr. VANDIVER. Not now.
Mr. HANBURY. I only desired to know how much time the gentleman had.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.
Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman from New York rose to a point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from New York rise to a point of order? He did not so state.
Mr. HANBURY. I desired to be informed how much more time the gentleman from Missouri had.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Missouri off the floor for such a question.
Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, regarding the cruelty of what is spoken of as "the water cure," I want to read just one or two bits of evidence. I read from the testimony of Corp. D. J. Evans before the Senate committee, page 2061. He says he has been in the United States Army for six years, serving in northern Luzon:

In the Regulars?
Yes, sir.
Are you a resident of Kansas?
Yes, sir.
Concordia, Kans., I believe?
Yes, sir.

After narrating what took place when a certain native Filipino was being subjected to this torture in order to get him to confess that he knew things that he had said he did not know about and to make him tell where the insurgents were, one of the members of the Senate committee asked him to describe in detail just what took place when they gave the natives this kind of torture. Here is what he says:

They refused to tell us, and they were given the water cure. The first thing one of the Americans—I mean one of the scouts for the Americans—grabbed one of the men by the head and jerked his head back, and then they took a tomato can and poured water down his throat until he could hold no more. During this time one of the natives had a rattan whip about as large as my finger and struck him on the face with it and on the bare back, and every time they would strike him it would raise a welt and some blood would come, and when this native could hold no more water then they forced a gag into his mouth. They stood him up on his feet, tied his hands behind him, then stood him up with his back against a post, and fastened him so that he could not move. Then one man—

Be it said with shame and disgrace to the American Army, after this man was tortured in this way and then tied to a post with his arms pinioned—

One man, an American soldier, who was 6 feet tall, and who was very strong, struck this native in the pit of the stomach as hard as he could strike him and just as rapidly as he could. It seemed as if he did not get tired of striking him.
Senator ALLISON. With his hand?
With his clenched fist. He struck him in the pit of the stomach, and it made him very sick. They kept that operation up for quite a time, and finally I thought the fellow was about to die, but I do not believe that he was quite that bad, because finally he told them he would tell.

That is, he was tortured until he was forced to confess things which probably he never did.

Now, that is just one instance. If I had time I would stand here all day and all night and read you one instance after another, not by the dozen, but by the score, and prove to you by eyewitnesses that these things were perpetrated by American soldiers and with the connivance of American officers, if not by their direct orders.

One witness testifies to more than 20 cases of this torture, all given in one day.

I will here read some of the testimony of Lieut. Grover Flint, of the Thirty-fifth Infantry. He is a grandson of the late Dr. Austin Flint, and a son-in-law of the late Dr. John Fisk, the historian. He spent a year and a half with the Army in the Philippines and witnessed many cases of this torture applied to prisoners in the province of Bulacan, in the island of Luzon. Here are the main points of his evidence, taken under oath:

By Senator PATTERSON:

Q. About how many were subjected to this torture the first night?
A. I could not say, I should rather think—well, the only answer I could give would be a guess.
Q. Give your best judgment.
A. According to my best judgment, I should think about 30 were put through it the first evening, because it kept on for a long time until daybreak. I should say 20 the next morning under my personal observation.

By Senator CARMACK:

Q. It kept on until daybreak, you say?
A. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

By Senator BURROWS:

Q. In this case where you say the water cure was administered to some 20 persons, I want to ask you what offense these people had committed?
A. They were supposed to be insurrectos. I did not at the time know enough of the language to understand the conversation between them and the Macabebes who were putting them through this ordeal. All I know is that they would take a man and throw him down and work on him for a while, and then he would run off and get a gun or a bolo.

Now, observe what he says about men tortured even to death:

I went over and said to Major Geary that no commissioned officer seemed to be in charge there or seemed to be observing it, and that I would stay there for a while if he wished me to. He said: "All right, if you want to." So in that way I happened to see this performed on about, I would say, something over 20 men. This was on the second morning. The things that I had witnessed the night before I had witnessed only casually here and there. I was not what you might call a spectator.
The CHAIRMAN. Did the men subjected to this torture die?
The WITNESS. I never saw a man die. But I saw a man who I thought was going to die once, and I had indirect evidence that a man had died in another case; but nothing that I could testify to.
Senator CARMACK. That men have died in other cases, you say?
The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

By Senator CULBERSON:

Q. Apparently you were about to detail what you actually saw the next morning?
A. Yes.
Q. You stated the night before you only casually saw it, and then you were going on to state what you saw in the morning?
A. In the morning I actually witnessed it. I saw men thrown down and heard their groans and that sort of thing.
Q. Please tell the committee what you actually saw?
A. That is, you want me to describe one individual case of a man being put through the water cure?
Q. Yes; I would like you to do that, sir.
A. Very good, sir. A man is thrown down on his back and three or four men sit or stand on his arms and legs and hold him down, and either a gun barrel or a rifle barrel or a carbine barrel or a stick as big as a belaying pin—that is, with an inch circumference——
Senator BEVERIDGE. As big in its diameter?
A. (Continued.) Yes; is simply thrust into his jaws and his jaws are thrust back, and, if possible, a wooden log or stone is put under his head——
Senator PATTERSON. Under his head or neck?
A. (Continued.) Under his neck, so he can be held firmly.
Senator BURROWS. His jaws are forced open, you say? How do you mean, crosswise?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; as a gag. In the case of very old men I have seen their teeth fall out—I mean when it was done a little roughly. He is simply held down, and then water is poured onto his face, down his throat and nose from a jar, and that is kept up until the man gives some sign of giving in or becomes unconscious, and when he becomes unconscious he is simply rolled aside and he is allowed to come to. That is as near a description as I think I can give. All the cases were alike I saw on that occasion.

By Senator CULBERSON:

Q. Is the water allowed to remain in the man, or is it anyway expelled from him, by any method?

A. Well, I know that in a great many cases, in almost every case, the men have been a little roughly handled; they were rolled aside rudely, so that water was expelled. A man suffers tremendously; there is no doubt about it. His suffering must be that of a man who is drowning, but who can not drown.

Q. Did you ever see a man place his foot on a man's stomach to force the water out of him?

A. Yes, sir.

The witness then explains that this water cure or torture was the common method used to get the natives to tell where their guns were and give the soldiers information about their neighbors.

They would enter a village or barrio without opposition and simply gather up a bunch of natives and begin on them in this way, and "put them through as a matter of routine," using the language of the witness.

He then explains another instance where 15 more were treated this way and how some of them held out longer than others. Here is his testimony on this point. Those who had no guns to surrender suffered the most. He says:

What I mean to say is that some men would yield almost instantly and would not be put through as brutal methods as I have described, while other men would have more courage or, perhaps, would be more ignorant, and they would be put through the stage, where they were unconscious or almost drowned.

By Senator MCCOMAS:

Q. Did that happen to a few or many of these men?

A. A rather small proportion, because by far the greater part, I should say probably two-thirds, of the people I saw did not get this severest treatment. In those cases it did not get to the point of great brutality. They simply would get up and run off and get their guns; and other men fought it out and would not yield until they had been subjected to severe treatment, and there was one man who absolutely refused.

Senator DIETRICH. You think it was the men who were the most ignorant who resisted the hardest, and those who seemed more intelligent yielded quickly and did not receive such harsh treatment?

The WITNESS. No; I think the men who were more courageous or perhaps did not have any guns suffered the most. By ignorant I mean that they did not really know anything to tell us.

Senator CARMACK. You say you saw one man who never did yield?

The WITNESS. Yes.

Senator BEVERIDGE. How is that?

Senator CARMACK. He said something about one man never yielding.

The WITNESS. One man was pointed out to me as being an alleged insurgent lieutenant, and he was pointed out as being absolutely unyielding.

Senator MCCOMAS. You did not see that?

The WITNESS. I saw his condition. They had worked pretty hard on him. He was pointed out simply as being a most gallant man——

Senator BEVERIDGE. What was his condition?

Senator CARMACK. He was pointed out as what?

The WITNESS. A man of great courage; that he had been absolutely unyielding and had simply defied us; that is all.

Senator BEVERIDGE. When this man was pointed out, what condition was he in?

The WITNESS. He was almost fainting. I did not see him worked upon, but I simply saw him being led around, and I think Major Geary sent word not to have anything to do with that man any more. I mean to let him pass, not to bother him any more, to let him go.

Also, Mr. Chairman, other kinds of torture have been invented. Observe the following in regard to Captain Ryan's method:

NEW FORMS OF TORTURE.

WASHINGTON, May 8, 1902.

Orders have been issued by Secretary Root for the court-martial of Capt. James A. Ryan, of the Fifteenth Cavalry, who is charged with improper conduct in obtaining information from natives in the Philippines.

Complaints of his actions having reached Manila, William P. Rhode, as special prosecutor, was sent to investigate.

His report to the attorney-general at Manila says that Captain Ryan used the following method to get information: Each individual before being examined had his arms tied to his body in such a manner that he could not protect his head from falling. Then he was stood up erect upon a wooden floor and had his legs knocked from under him.

His body was lifted and his head jolted against the floor once more, whereupon he was stood upon his head in a bucket of water for a certain length of time, and was then examined. This process was employed three times in succession before Ubaldo Abing made his statement.

Altogether about a dozen natives are said to have received this treatment.

Mr. Rhode's report also says that Captain Ryan believes that the Filipino is incorrigible, and that two generations of military government will not put them in condition for civil government. He further, somewhat inconsistently, believes American occupation unjust; that the Filipino can not survive, and that the American can never live in the islands. Drastic measures seem to him absolutely necessary for self-preservation and the inculcation of loyalty toward the United States.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. VANDIVER. Not till I get through with this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield at present.

Mr. VANDIVER. Furthermore, I now wish to read a few statements of findings of courts-martial that have investigated some of these cases of cruelty. I will have to read them hurriedly, because my time is nearly out. Here is a list of the trials and investigations by court-martial. I select only a few of them, but there are dozens and scores of them here. You gentlemen have challenged me to produce cases of cruelty, and I am doing it from the record:

Walter Turnbull, jr., Company I, Fourteenth Infantry, February 18, 1899; charge, assaulting native women with a bayonet. Found guilty; dishonorably discharged, with forfeiture of pay and allowance, and three years' confinement.

Clarence R. Moore, Company H, Thirty-fifth Infantry; charge, looting. Found guilty; fined $30.

Private Otto R. Conine, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry; charge, rape. Guilty; sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment.

Corporal George Danhoffer, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, date of trial July 24, 1899; charge, rape; found guilty.

Henry Bruce, Company A, Twenty-fifth Infantry, assault on natives, including a young girl. Fined $20 and two months' confinement in prison.

Now, you say these were punished. Yes; so they were. But the fact that they were punished does not relieve the people who suffered from their barbarity. Nor does it help the gentleman from Michigan in his denial that the soldiers were guilty of the crimes alleged against them.

But these are only a few of the many I might read.

I will instance a few other cases, as I am forced to do so by the denials of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. LESSLER. Will not that indicate——

Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield at this point.

Alvan S. Gross, Company L, Nineteenth Infantry, charged with looting a church. Dishonorably discharged, and forfeiture of pay.

Arthur B. Butler, Company A, Twenty-fifth Infantry, charged with assault on two native women with intent to commit rape. Fined $45, and five months' imprisonment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a great number of these cases here in the record, and I have not the time to read them all, nor even one-tenth part of them, but if I may be permitted, there are one or two more that I wish to refer to, because they are unexampled instances of barbarity. Here, for instance, is one Edward M. Boodie, Troop C, Third Cavalry, charged with the murder of a native boy by shooting him with a pistol. He was found guilty, and the court-martial enters this comment opposite his name:

A crime of peculiar atrocity that might be viewed with horror by the most debased savage.

Here is another—Thomas H. McClanahan, Company L, Eighth Infantry—charged with assault and raping a middle-aged native woman, April, 1901; was dishonorably discharged and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment.

Harry A. Mooney, Company L, Eighth Infantry, charged with the rape of a native woman, was found guilty and sentenced to twenty years.

There are two other cases of a similar character, charged with rape of native women, found guilty by the court-martial and sentenced to death, and then by the President of the United States the sentence was commuted to twenty years' imprisonment.

Mr. Chairman, if these were simply sporadic cases, if these cases had happened only occasionally, if such crimes as these were only the occasional incident of war, I might be inclined to overlook it as one of the accidental incidents of horrible warfare; but here they stand, one after another, dozens, and scores, and hundreds, as bad as can be imagined, as horrible as ever were committed by savage or civilized man in the whole history of the human race. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not made and shall not make a general onslaught against the American soldier. I can not believe that all the American soldiers, or a large percentage of them, are guilty of these crimes; but here are the facts. You tell us that this cruelty is an incident to war. You tell us that we must have an army over there. You tell us that these things are incidents of war. I want to say to you that if the necessities of war, in order to hold the Filipino people in subjection to our control, bring with them this horror—this inhuman horror—then for God's sake get out of there as soon as possible before the name of the American soldier is still further tarnished and the flag forever disgraced, and the soldiers themselves still further brutalized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I had time I would read you here the reports of the inspector-general who investigated the charges of cruelty in northern Luzon and another in the province of Panay. I would also show you that they have gone over there and employed native scouts—the ferocious Macabebe savages—to make war on the people of the other parts of the islands, and that they have committed outrages so infernal and so inhuman that language fails to describe them, and if I should undertake to describe them I should be compelled to use language that would not be tolerated in public print.

In one instance, on the 25th of February, 1900, these native scouts, under the command of American officers, went to one little barrio, invaded the houses of these natives, and took old gray-haired men out behind the house and shot them down, and in other instances went into houses and shot down the husbands by the side of their wives, and then raped the wife herself.

Brigadier-General Wheaton says, on page 1753 of this document:

These scouts whom we have employed are liable to commit murder, and many will rob and ravish whenever they have the opportunity.

These are his exact words.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. VANDIVER. I yield to a question.

Mr. HAMILTON. From what reports are you reciting?

Mr. VANDIVER. I am reading——

Mr. HAMILTON. The place, page, and authority?

Mr. VANDIVER. I will give the page and authority and point out not only these instances that I have mentioned, but a hundred more, if the gentleman insists upon it and I have the time. I am merely reciting facts gathered from official reports and Senate committee hearings, and refer you to pages 1754 to 1760 and succeeding pages.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; I yield to a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. When my colleague prints this speech as a campaign document, to be circulated in Missouri, I should like him to print this question with his speech, namely: Is the Army of the United States a Republican institution or does the gentleman admit that both parties are responsible for both the Army and the Navy and their conduct abroad, and if the Army and the Navy, instead of being partisan institutions, are merely American institutions for which we are all responsible?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; but because there are Democrats in the Army I will not apologize for everything the Army does.

I want to say to the gentleman that he is the first man who has introduced into this debate any idea of partisanship. I have not intimated in any word I have said whether it is Democratic or Republican. I will print the gentleman's question and my answer. I will say to the gentleman also that it is my pride and boast here to-day that the American Navy has not tarnished its name, so far as I have been able to learn, with any acts of cruelty, but has held up the American flag with pride to all the world, and against it there is not a black mark. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. VANDIVER. I can not yield further at this time. The gentlemen on the other side can get all the time they want, and let them take the time and discuss this matter if they wish to do so.

Now, it has been said that these are heathenish people over there, and if we were to draw out and let them alone they would shoot each other down, they would engage in general internecine war that would destroy them, and so it appears that in order to keep them from shooting each other down we have got to go in and shoot them down first. [Laughter.]

Now, as to their general character, I read from very high authority. General MacArthur, when he was before the Senate committee, was asked this question:

As a whole, General, I believe in your report you speak of the Filipino people in an appreciative way, as people of considerable native intelligence, quick and apt, and generous, flexible, and peaceable?

General MACARTHUR. I believe that is the general tenor.

Mr. CARMACK. I understand you to say that you would be willing to give them a very considerable share in the general government?

General MACARTHUR. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. Do you think they should have it now?

General MACARTHUR. I would be glad to give it to them now, as I have said. I have become attached to these people and have a good deal of faith in them.

Now, I suppose you will not question that authority. Now, Mr. Chairman, after all the brutality that has been practiced not only by the American officers and American soldiers, but by native scouts under command of American officers, there comes this final climax, the order of one Jacob H. Smith that the island of Samar shall be made "a howling wilderness." Major Waller was brought to account for atrocities committed in the island, and he pleaded that he was obeying the orders of his superior. He was tried by a court-martial and was acquitted on that plea, and his superior was then summoned for trial, and here is the last we have seen in relation to that trial. We have not yet had a full report of it. But here is a cablegram which I will read:

MANILA, April 25, 1902——

Mr. LANDIS. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. VANDIVER. From an Associated Press dispatch from Manila.

Mr. LANDIS. What is it published in?

Mr. VANDIVER. It is published in the Irish World of May 3, after appearing in nearly every daily paper in the country. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

You may laugh; it is an easy matter to laugh at these things. But here is the report, and nobody denies it:

MANILA, April 25, 1902.

Colonel Woodruff, counsel for Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith, United States Army, under court-martial here, produced a sensation at the opening session of the court to-day by admitting the truth of the reported atrocities by American troops in Samar.

Colonel Woodruff made this statement:

General Smith had issued orders to kill the natives and to burn their homes.

The country was hostile to the Americans and General Smith did not desire any prisoners.

General Smith had issued orders to make Samar a howling wilderness.

General Smith had ordered that all persons capable of bearing arms should be killed.

The age limit was made 10 years, because many such boys had borne arms against the American troops.

All above 10 years of age to be slaughtered!

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; a question.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I have not had the pleasure of listening to all of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am sorry, for the gentleman would have been instructed. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Has the gentleman spent any time in investigating the atrocities that the Filipinos have committed on the American soldiers?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. To what extent?

Mr. VANDIVER. To what extent! Well, now, I think the gentleman realizes there is no sense in such a question. [Laughter.] I have investigated the matter probably as much as it has been investigated on the other side, and I am frank to say that there are numerous cases of atrocities committed by Filipinos against American soldiers.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why has not the gentleman spent as much time criticising the Filipinos as he has criticising the American soldiers?

Mr. VANDIVER. First, because these statements have been denied, and secondly, because you gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber show no disposition to inquire into the matter or consider more than one side of it, and when any bill is before the House we can not get time to discuss fully all the phases of the question. You have denied facts, and hence I am proving them. But as to the atrocities committed by the Filipinos against the American soldiers, I say that no man regrets them or detests them more than I do. But what is their excuse, what is their provocation? We have invaded their country; we are the invaders, and they are defending their homes and their wives and children. I do not justify their barbarities. I deplore and abhor them. But so long as we attempt to subjugate them these horrors will continue, and our own soldiers will be tempted and provoked into these inhuman methods of warfare. For God's sake stop it before we have brutalized our whole Army. If there is a man on this floor who is willing to stand here as the apologist for an American soldier under the American flag acting as a murderer and a torturer, and committing rape and every other crime imaginable, while we are trying to force our sovereignty on those people, I want him to stand up and say so.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. VANDIVER. Oh, yes; for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman says that we are invaders. Now, how did we acquire possession of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. VANDIVER. Oh, the gentleman would like to go back into ancient history and rake up everything, I suppose, to cover up the issue. I am presenting facts here. I challenge the gentleman to deny one of the facts. I will not stop to discuss that question, further than to say that we have no title to that country that rests on a just, moral, or equitable basis.

Mr. HAMILTON. I deny that we are invaders.

Mr. VANDIVER. Do you deny the cruelties and barbarities that are being practiced there now?

Mr. HAMILTON. You said that we were invaders. Do you deny what I have just said, that we acquired the country by treaty?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; I deny that we have any right to it.

Mr. HAMILTON. You deny it, do you? On what grounds do you deny it?

Mr. VANDIVER. That what Spain did not own she could not sell to us. But I shall not be diverted from the purpose of my remarks in presenting facts as brought out in the testimony. If the gentleman will be quiet a while I will give him some more.

Mr. LESSLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LESSLER]?

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, let him ask what he has to ask, and be quick about it. My time is nearly out, and I have been interrupted so much that I am not half through.

Mr. LESSLER. Does not the gentleman also know of the water cure being administered to our soldiers?

Mr. VANDIVER. In some instances it may be so, and I condemn it as strongly as you do. Now, I ask you whether you approve of civilized soldiers torturing uncivilized people, as you call them, for the purpose of extorting confessions from them? Answer yes or no. Answer, or else take your seat.

Mr. LESSLER. You can not order me to take my seat. I will answer you in this way——

Mr. VANDIVER. Then take your seat anyhow, and wait till your time comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield further. If I were practicing the barbarities that have been practiced upon the Filipinos, I would subject you to the water cure and make you answer anyhow. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LESSLER. Probably. But you would have to be a good deal taller and better minded than you are in order to do so.

Mr. VANDIVER. That sounds very much like the twittering of the sparrows in the trees in Central Park or a chippy from the Bowery. [More laughter.]

Mr. LESSLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VANDIVER. For a question only.

Mr. LESSLER. I would like to ask whether you have read what is generally known as General Order No. 1?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes, I have read it; but I do not think you have. That is all I want to say now on that question. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the famous order No. 100 of President Lincoln is humane and reasonable; but the perpetrators of these crimes can not be sheltered behind that order, because it is the very order they have violated. There is nothing in it to warrant cruelty and barbarity. This order has been reissued for the government of our Army in the Philippines. It consists of a series of rules to regulate soldiers in the field. These are the very rules that have been violated.

I will read some of them right here and ask you to compare them with the evidence I have just been quoting. Compare the general order with the actual facts, and say whether you think the war in the Philippines has demoralized and brutalized our soldiers or not. Observe especially rule 16, rule 44, and rule 80.

Among these rules you will find the following in order No. 100:

Rule 16. Military necessity does not admit of cruelty—that is, the infliction of suffering for the sake of suffering or for revenge, nor of maiming or wounding except in fight, nor of torture to extort confessions. * * *

Rule 44. All wanton violence committed against persons in the invaded country, all destruction of property not commanded by the authorized officer, all robbery, all pillage or sacking, even after taking a place by main force; all rape, wounding, maiming, or killing of such inhabitants are prohibited under the penalty of death, or such other severe punishment as may seem adequate for the gravity of the offense. * * *

Rule 56. A prisoner of war is subject to no punishment for being a public enemy, nor is any revenge wreaked upon him by the intentional infliction of any suffering or disgrace by cruel imprisonment, want of food, by mutilation, death, or any other barbarity.

Rule 75. Prisoners of war are subject to confinement or imprisonment such as may be deemed necessary on account of safety, but they are to be subjected to no other intentional suffering or indignity. * * *

Rule 80. Honorable men, when captured, will abstain from giving to the enemy information concerning their own army; and the modern law of war permits no longer use of any violence against prisoners in order to extort the desired information or to punish them for having given false information.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is an insult to the memory of Lincoln to say that our soldiers in the Philippines have been governed by this order given by him to the Army of the Union in 1862. It is an insult to the old soldiers of that gallant conflict to plead their example in extenuation of the crimes committed against noncombatants, against prisoners, and against helpless women and children in the provinces of Luzon and Samar.

Furthermore, when you say that I am insulting the Army, I remind you that Gen. Nelson Miles, the head of the Army, on the 17th of last December, sent to the Secretary of War an official communication declaring that—

The war in the Philippines is being conducted with marked severity.

He then went further and proposed remedies. He does not sanction these barbarities. I am therefore sustaining the head of the Army. But I trust, sir, that the time may never come when a civil officer, especially a representative of the people on this floor, will be afraid to criticise criminals because they happen to belong to the Army and have on the uniform of American soldiers.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that if the hatred of American rule in the Philippines is so deep seated that 10-year-old boys are in arms against us and making such dangerous and valiant soldiers as they are likewise doing in South Africa against British aggression, then you must admit that it has become a war of extermination. If "Hell-roaring Smith" makes a howling wilderness of Samar; the Macabebe scouts torture, rob, ravish, and murder the inhabitants of northern Luzon, and the Mohammedan Moros of the southern islands (3,000,000 of them, more or less) yet to be exterminated, all in the effort to civilize and Christianize these desperate people, we may as well realize that our task has not yet fairly commenced. Five separate times we have been told the war was over, but it still goes on. In the language of President Schurman, one of McKinley's commissioners to the Philippines—

Those Americans, patriotic but unversed in history, who desire to recreate the Filipinos in their own similitude will always be able to demonstrate that the oriental clay is still without shape and seemliness in the American potter's hand, and that for a perfect product, a vessel of honor and glory, the American wheel must be kept going for years, perhaps for generations, or possibly even for centuries. Heaven save the Filipinos from so impertinent and meddlesome an earthly providence. The Filipinos are to develop along their own racial lines, not along ours; and it is colossal conceit and impudence to disparage them because they are different from ourselves. Capacity for independent self-government does not necessarily mean capacity like ours to administer a commonwealth like ours, but merely capacity of some sort to maintain peace and order, to uphold law, and to fulfill international obligations. It may be a matter of only a short time when the Christian Filipinos of Luzon and the Visayas will be as well qualified to discharge these functions as Mexico, Peru, Argentina, or Venezuela. And when they are so qualified the American Government has no further duty or business in the archipelago. Any decent kind of government of Filipinos by Filipinos is better than the best possible government of Filipinos by Americans.

Aye, sir, it is the same old story of foreign conquest and "criminal aggression"—"the strength of civilization without its mercy," as Macaulay has said of the British conquest of India. It is the robbery of the weak to enrich the strong. We may exterminate those people and take their lands, but we will suffer in the end. The god of justice is greater than the god of battles. I condemn not the soldier obeying orders, but I condemn the policy and purpose of the Administration which forces him into this unholy conflict.

It has been whispered by a bard of old that the angel of mercy sometimes hovers over the stricken field on which lay the bleeding victims of a gallant but misguided cause and pleads forgiveness for their crimes, and hence I trust that the private soldier and the subordinate officer who has been compelled under the usages of war and in obedience to superior commands to engage in this unholy strife may find mercy at the court of heaven, but where, oh, where, is the angel with mantle of charity broad enough and sympathy wide enough to plead forgiveness for the hellish demons, "tyrants dressed in a little brief authority" and dead to all the feelings of human nature, who have driven on this car of Juggernaut to crush the lives and hopes of helpless millions merely for the sake of establishing our authority over the islands of the sea so far away that the voice of the sufferer can scarcely reach the homes of the intruder?

For me to express my horror and detestation of these miserable outrages and indulge a sentiment of sympathy for struggling and helpless humanity you say is treason, do you? Then, sir, if humanity is treason, make the most of it. If my country no longer stands for justice—if her name is to be no longer the synonym for human rights and human freedom, then, in the name of God, what have we left to be proud of?

Mr. FOSS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD.]

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to address the committee somewhat at length and in detail upon a subject-matter of some importance, in my judgment, to the history of the Navy and the country, and having a close relationship to, if not directly involved in, the provisions of this bill.

I had intended to discuss the findings of the recent court of inquiry as to Admiral Schley and the approval of those findings by the President of the United States, which latter, I propose to say in all frankness and with great respect, in my judgment, are decidedly less tenable and less defensible than the findings themselves.

In view, however, of the sad and rather pathetic close of the life of one of the parties to this general controversy within recent date, I shall abstain from any such discussion at this time, because I realize there could be no discussion of the conduct of Admiral Schley, as to the part borne by him at the battle of Santiago and the events leading up to it, that would not necessitate a comparison of the respective claims and relative merit of performance as between him and Admiral Sampson.

I have no disposition to encourage or countenance indulgence in any of the spirit of acrimony with which that controversy has been clothed at this time.

I wish to say, also, in this connection, and as a devoted friend and admirer of Admiral Schley, that I have naught but the profoundest respect for the memory of Admiral Sampson and for the faithful and distinguished services rendered by him in the line of the duties that fell to him and the opportunities that were his. I have no feeling other than that of grateful regard due to all of the brave and loyal participants in that struggle in which and out of which, in the language of him who, in my judgment, was its central and commanding figure, there was "glory enough for all." [Applause.]

But apart from this controversy, Mr. Chairman, and without entering into it at all, I want to give notice at this time that I intend, when we shall reach that paragraph in the bill making provisions for text-books and other appliances for instruction at the Naval Academy—pages 61 and 63 of the bill—to offer the following amendment:

Provided, however, That no part of the money appropriated in this section or elsewhere in this bill, or to be hereafter appropriated, shall be expended in the purchase of any history of the Spanish-American war written by Edgar Stanton Maclay for use at the Naval Academy, in ships' libraries, or in any other part of the naval establishment of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word as to that amendment. I shall not discuss it in detail at this time. I realize that it will be subject to a point of order in the precise shape in which it is submitted, and if there shall be found anyone here who wants to interpose a point of order against its consideration I shall make it germane by omitting the words "hereafter to be appropriated."

Had it not been for this false and malicious publication, made under circumstances which at the time gave color to the contention of its author that it was made with the approval of men high up in the Navy Department, we would have been spared the necessity of the court of inquiry, and the regrettable bitterness of the controversy that followed, with its hurtful effects upon the Navy and the country.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MUDD. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it not true that it did have the approval of men high in authority in the Navy Department?

Mr. MUDD. I did not wish to put it in that shape.

Mr. COCHRAN. Put it in such shape as would give your opinion on the subject.

Mr. MUDD. I know that was charged. I believe it was to some extent denied. I want to say for myself that I think there was much color of truth given to the charge by the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think there was nothing else but color of truth.

Mr. MUDD. Well, I will leave it in that way. I know that the answer to the suggestion for proscribing the use of this history in our great naval school by legislative direction will be that there is no intention upon the part of the Department so to use it, in reply to which, without discussing it further now, I will say that Secretary Long, when the first edition of this history was published, in an interview in the Washington Post, a copy of which I have retained, stated specifically that he would bar it out of the Academy "in its present form." That only, and that expressly, he stated. He promised nothing further than that and left us to the inference that in a revised and expurgated form it might be used in the Academy, as are the first two volumes now used as books of reference and text-books.

There is every reasonable expectation to believe that under the auspices of the powers that will have control this work will be upon the shelves of every ship's library in the Navy, taking rank and prominence along with the Bible and the Constitution and the Regulations of the Navy, a short time after publication of its revised edition, just recently issued.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not seeking at this time to precipitate any controversy as to the respective claims to recognition between Admiral Schley and anybody else. I am not asking any special favors for Admiral Schley. He needs none. I am simply asking in this amendment, which I shall urge with all the vigor that I possess, that the money of the Government of the United States shall not be used to further officially tarnish the bright name of that hero of our late war. [Applause.]

I ask Congress to see to it that there shall be no official sanction of a history that goes as far in condemnation of Admiral Schley as does the verdict of the naval court of inquiry. Schley needs no special honors at the hands of the people at present in charge of the official machinery of the Navy Department. He asks none. He may not be secure in the findings of courts of inquiry; his deeds may not be duly recorded in an inspired or official history of the Spanish-American war; but secure in the affections of the plain, unbiased people of this country, he can well rest assured of the just verdict of brave men everywhere, and await with confidence the calm and impartial verdict of a history which, if it be not preserved in written characters in books, will remain imperishably recorded by the landmarks of the fragments of the enemy's fleet strewn by him along the coast line of Cuba, and by the characters written by the wrecks of Spanish vessels at the bottom of the waters of the Caribbean Sea. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I came into the Hall while the gentleman from Missouri was portraying the outrages that had been perpetrated by the American soldiers upon the Filipinos, and I regretted very much to hear it. I had hoped that there would be a monopoly of that kind of talk elsewhere and that we should not have in the House of Representatives the maligning and slandering of the American Army while in the performance of its duty.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to anybody for anything.

Mr. VANDIVER. Do you say that the statements I made were maligning and misrepresenting the Army?

Mr. HILL. I say absolutely that the one-sided statement of any case is a falsehood on its face and must be so; and had the gentleman desired to be fair to the American Army he would have stated both sides of this proposition.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to say to the gentleman that if I had sufficient time to do it, and that if I occupied a place as he does——

Mr. HILL. Well, you had an hour, and I have five minutes.

Mr. VANDIVER. If I occupied a place where I had an opportunity to do it, I would state every side of this case.

Mr. HILL. I decline to yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then I just simply want to say to you that you have maligned and misrepresented the officers of the United States Government who have made these reports.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, it was my pleasure during the last summer to visit the Philippine Islands. This is the first time I have referred to that fact since this Congress opened. I should not do so now but for the statements made by the gentleman from Missouri, and especially the statement made in regard to Gen. Jacob H. Smith. I had the pleasure of visiting Gen. Jacob H. Smith's department, going through it for 120 miles. I found the people at peace, engaged in the usual avocations of peace, with everything quiet, business being transacted in a regular and orderly way, and no difficulty or trouble with anybody passing up and down through that department. But it had not always been so; and it seems to me that it is at least fair, while a man's character is under consideration and being tried by the regularly constituted authorities, by a court-martial, that both sides of this House should at least withhold a verdict until that court-martial and those regularly constituted authorities have made their findings.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HILL. I have but five minutes, and there is one thing I want to state.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. I state that I found the department of Gen. Jacob H. Smith in peace and quietness, and yet while that condition existed this incident actually occurred. A company of Tagalos, Filipinos—the Filipino army, if you choose to call it such—descended upon a village of peaceable Filipinos who chose to carry on their regular business pursuits in peace and quietness and destroyed that village, murdering men, women, and children, and if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] desires a specimen of barbarity I want to tell you what they did to loyal Filipinos and Americans. They took men out and tied them to ant hills. Now, that may seem a strange thing, but those ant hills are 6 or 8 or 10 feet high and 6 feet in diameter, filled with ants that are absolutely ravenous and eat up everything they come in contact with. They tied these men to ant hills and allowed them to be eaten to death by ants. They buried them in the ground up to their necks and allowed them to be pecked to death by the birds and eaten by the ants. They took loyal Filipinos and loyal Americans and cut them open in the abdomen, taking out a portion of the bowel and nailing it to a tree and driving them around the tree with bolos compelling them to disembowel themselves, and yet you gentlemen stand here and condemn American soldiers for standing by the men who are loyal to the American flag, and who are suffering such outrages as these.

Mr. VANDIVER. For the very same kind of barbarities which you are now charging against the Filipinos.

Mr. HILL. Talk about water cures! Fight your political battles decently! Do not attempt to do it by slandering American soldiers in the performance of their duty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did you notice any difference between the size of 10-year-old boys over there and here?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I have seen too many 10-year-old boys on the other side of this House to have any trouble in recognizing the difference. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCHRAN. That is your answer. Let me ask you one question further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. And I expect he is glad of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. TONGUE].

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, just recently some new policies to be adopted into Federal legislation have been proposed and advocated that greatly concern the West, from which I come, and the agricultural classes, whom I in part represent. They have been urged by members on that side of the House, by leading Democratic newspapers in various sections of the country, by Democratic clubs and Democratic committees with such vigor and persistency that they demand attention. The "eternal principles" of Democracy, it seems, refuse to be "eternal" or to stay fixed or to have immortality thrust upon them. They seem to be in need of repair, and are undergoing their usual biennial readjustment. The Democratic party, Mr. Chairman, seems to have found from recent occurrences a new political issue, in which it hopes to unite its scattered elements. A "new issue" is something for which with eager eyes it has been scanning the political horizon for some time past.

At last one seems to have presented itself, like Minerva, full armed from the brain of Jove, and has been eagerly welcomed. During the last few days there has been an unusual and abnormal and unjustifiable increase in the retail price of fresh meats. This condition has affected every household. Prices to the consumer have reached a point never attained during many years, if at any time in the history of the country. Meats which were formerly purchased by the housekeeper at 18 to 20 cents per pound suddenly increased in price to 30 and 35 cents per pound.

In many instances prices of meat to the consumer in Eastern cities have more than doubled, and that within the past sixty days. Our Democratic brethren, who some years ago based their campaign largely upon the low price of products, and charged it to the increase in the value of gold, have now discovered that upon some farm products at least prices are too high. They are commencing, if not a vigorous, a very noisy campaign to reduce the price upon commodities which a few years ago they claimed it as their special mission to increase.

Realizing the consternation that such an unusual increase in the prices of the necessaries of life must carry to many hearthstones, they have adopted as a new battle cry "Cheap food for the masses." Discovering what they believe to be an evil, they are looking for a remedy. It is not necessary for them to look far. The time-honored one of the Democratic party is always at hand. In Democratic eyes no economic evil afflicts the American people that is not caused by the "iniquitous" tariff. "Down with the tariff," particulars not given, is their remedy for every political ill which afflicts the body politic. Whatever business misfortunes befall the people of the country are laid to the door of the tariff. They can conceive of no other remedy in the present instance, except to remove the tariff.

When a housekeeper complains that she is asked 40 cents per pound for poultry for which she formerly paid 12, she is told that it is the tariff of 5 cents per pound upon dressed poultry. When the boarder at a restaurant is asked at the rate of 25 cents per pound more for his beefsteak than sixty days ago, he is told it is the tariff. When the housekeeper wishes to purchase a choice piece of tenderloin steak and is asked $1 per pound, she is told that it is the tariff of 2 cents per pound upon dressed beef. They would have us believe that just outside the boundaries of the Republic, upon every side of us, are great quantities of the choicest of tenderloin, praying for someone to remove the 2-cent tariff barrier and permit these choice morsels to be sold to the starving people of the United States for $1 per pound.

According to this new edition of the gospel of reunited Democracy there are great swarms of fat chickens perched upon the trees and fences just outside of the 5-cent tariff wall surrounding the Republic and praying someone to let down the bars so they can fly to our very doors and enjoy the blessed privilege of being killed, picked, and sold to hungry Americans at 40 cents per pound. In some way, in some form, the resentment of the eating public must be thoroughly aroused and utilized for political purposes in aid of the Democratic party.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a well-informed member of this House on either side, or an intelligent man in public life, who does not know that the recent unusual increase in the price of meat is not the work of the farmer, of the stock raiser, or of the stock feeder. They are not receiving the benefit of the increase. It has not been made in their interest, but they are now being injured and will continue to be injured in the future by it. It is no more the result of the tariff, which has not been disturbed in five years, than the increase in the wholesale price of domestic fine salt within thirteen months, from $5.50 a ton to $25.80 per ton, is caused by a tariff of $1.60 per ton. Both these tariffs were the same five years ago as they are now. The recent unusual increase in the price of meat, as the increase in the price of salt, is the work of a great and unholy combination and a conscienceless trust, and wholly for the benefit of a trust that defies law and despoils both the owner of live stock and the consumer of meat products. The remedy should be directed to the cause of the evil.

The Attorney-General has already instituted proceedings for this purpose. The Democratic party, according to a speech made by the gentleman from New Jersey to his constituents a short time ago, has discovered that "there is no power in the President and none in the Attorney-General to suppress monopoly." And so our Democratic friends, in their eagerness to take advantage of temporary conditions and make political capital out of an excited and indignant public opinion, now propose to strike, not at the real culprit, but, as I expect to show, at one of its victims. They propose to let the guilty escape and punish the innocent for political purposes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TONGUE. Yes, if it is brief, as I have but little time.

Mr. COCHRAN. When do you think the Attorney-General or the President first discovered that there was a beef trust; within the last thirty days?

Mr. TONGUE. That question had probably better be directed to the Attorney-General. I am not the keeper of his official secrets. I want to say——

Mr. COCHRAN. After the beef trust has been discovered and prosecuted, will the Attorney-General prosecute the steel trust, the barb-wire trust, the wood-pulp trust, and other trusts that have been in existence, some for forty, some for twenty, and some for ten years?

Mr. TONGUE. I am not undertaking to discuss all the trusts. Some of these were in existence as prominently when the gentleman's own party was in power as they are now. If the attitude of the gentleman from New Jersey is correct, that "there is no power in the President and there is none in the Attorney-General to suppress monopoly," and that this can be done only by an amended Federal Constitution, proceedings would be of little value.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman indorse the opinion of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. TONGUE. No; I do know, and from a recent conference with the Attorney-General I feel fully warranted in saying that if the gentleman from Missouri will come out of his hazy realm of common report and hearsay and will produce to the Attorney-General tangible, legal, and valid evidence showing the existence and operation of any trust doing business contrary to the laws of the United States, proceedings will be promptly instituted against them and vigorously prosecuted. But I am not going into the entire trust question. Just now I am after one trust—the meat trust—and I propose to say something to my friends on the other side of the House for the singular remedy they propose. It is a proposition not to injure, but to help, the trust; not to reduce its prices to consumers, but to enlarge the markets in which it is to purchase and destroy competition; not in its selling, but in its buying. While retaining protection upon every other product they propose to remove all duties, not only from fresh meats, not only from all meat-producing live stock, but from all "food stuffs in daily use," which includes every agricultural production within the United States.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TONGUE. I have not the time to yield.

Mr. SULZER. Is the gentleman willing to vote to take the tariff on meat products off?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TONGUE. I certainly am not, and yet that would not lower the price of meat. Does the gentleman suppose that taking the tariff of 2 cents a pound on tenderloin beefsteak that sells for $1 a pound would reduce the price to the consumer? Does the gentleman from New York suppose that taking the tariff of 5 cents a pound off dressed chickens, now selling in this city at 40 cents a pound, would reduce the price to 12 cents, just as it was a year ago under the same tariff?

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. TONGUE. I have not time to discuss all these questions relating to the tariff in the limited time assigned to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. The gentleman from New York is aware that a gentleman can not be taken from the floor when he declines to yield.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I want to consider for a moment the remedy proposed by our Democratic friends, and its probable effect.

The New York American and Journal, ambitious to be the leading Democratic newspaper of the country, in its issue of the 24th ultimo devotes more than a page to this question. It is full of glaring headlines, sentences in capitals, all centering to one purpose. "Off with the tariff on beef, veal, mutton, and pork." I will read a few extracts from that paper:

Through the manipulations of monopolists the prices of meats have recently been increased enormously.

Thus an unusual demand for other articles of food has been artificially created, and they, in turn, have greatly advanced in price.

The chief articles of food controlled by the monopolists of the food trust are beef, veal, mutton, and pork.

These meat monopolists are enabled in part to maintain their mastery of the market by the tariff duties now levied upon foreign beef, veal, mutton, and pork.

This partnership between the Government and the food trust must come to an end.

Congress, if it so wills, can at once repeal the Dingley duties and let in free the beef, mutton, and pork of Canada and Mexico.

That would bring prices down on the run.

It would give relief to the plundered people and the suffering poor at once.

The American and Journal proposes to the people of the United States that they pour in petitions to the House of Representatives in favor of the passage of a free-meat bill.

Off with the tariff on beef, veal, mutton, and pork.

Let that be the cry of every victim of the food trust.

Every pillaged household should be a campaign headquarters for the furtherance of this movement against famine prices for the necessaries of life.

Down with the food trust.

Give Congress to understand that you mean business.

Mr. MCDERMOTT, a Democratic member of Congress from New Jersey, on the 23d of last month introduced a bill to remove all the duty "upon meat of any kind and upon live or dressed poultry imported from foreign countries."

On the 25th ultimo Mr. SIMS, another Democratic member, introduced a similar bill for the repeal of all duties "upon beef, mutton, pork, and veal."

The Detroit Free Press, a leading Democratic paper, in a recent issue, urges the total repeal of the duties upon "cattle, sheep, and dressed meats."

It urges that in this way—

The markets of the United States would be thrown open to Canadian cattle and sheep, as well as to the refrigerated beef of Argentine and Australia.

It further alleges:

Whether the high prices are due to the operation of the trust or to the scarcity of supply, it is the evident duty of Congress to remove the tariff, in the interest of the consumer.

It forgets that the recent increased retail price is due to neither.

The demand for cheaper meats is immediate.

A leading newspaper a few days ago contained the following in its Washington dispatches:

A New York paper to-day polled the Democratic side of the House to ascertain whether the members were willing to vote for the removal of duties on meats on account of the beef trust having forced prices so much higher. Almost all gave affirmative answers.

The Washington Post, owned and controlled by an ex-Democratic member of Congress and substantially a Democratic paper, under the name of Independent, in its issue of Friday, May 2, also adds its indorsement of this new Democratic issue. It makes the following statement:

The duty is $2.75 a head on cattle worth not more than $14 a head, and 27½ per cent on cattle valued at a higher price. The repeal of this tax would let in cattle in large numbers from Mexico and Canada—cheap cattle for the farmer to restock the ranges that are said to be depleted; fat cattle for the butcher from the latter.

Not only the cattle duty but the tariff on all carnivorous foods, including pork, veal, mutton, poultry, and the 2 cents a pound on dressed beef, should come off. * * * In an emergency like this, it is folly to talk of waiting till Congress can make a thorough revision of the tariff before the cattle duty and other immediate taxes are touched. This is an occasion that demands dispatch.

But the same paper in its editorial columns of yesterday morning asserts:

It is everlastingly true that the country does not want and will not have an entire abolition of protection,

The same paper in an editorial this morning, discussing this subject, contains the following:

Meanwhile the one sure and immediate remedy is left untried. Republican candidates for Congress will be compelled to defend the tariff taxes on beef cattle and on dressed meats. * * *

And the beef trust is but one of their many afflictions. They know that the country is not a bit in love with the Democratic party, but they remember that their party has more than once been subjected by its own members to the wholesome discipline of defeat.

This is a plain issue. We are given notice "that the country does not want and will not have an entire abolition of protection" of the productions of the factory, but Democracy asserts that the country does want and will have an entire abolition of protection to the productions of the farm and range. Republican candidates for Congress are given notice of this issue and are threatened with defeat if they attempt "to defend the tariff taxes on beef cattle and on dressed meats."

A meeting held in Jersey City on the 28th ultimo, dominated by Democrats and addressed by Democrats, passed resolutions, alleging among other things:

That food at our very borders prohibited an entry until a tariff rate is paid, is not protection but oppression.

The essential and most expeditious remedy to bring to an end this condition is the immediate repeal of the tariff on all meats and food stuffs in daily use.

The executive committee of the national and State associations of Democratic clubs, and the State League of Democratic Clubs at a recent conference adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas President Roosevelt has set the Department of Justice in motion on the protest of the people against the meat monopolists; and

Whereas the food trust is being attacked by the Attorney-General of the United States; and

Whereas it is desired to rescue the people from the clutches of the trust; and

Whereas Congress, if it so wills, can place the food products controlled by the trust upon the free list in a very short time; and

Whereas it seems necessary that Congress should be stirred to activity in this direction: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of these United States should send a special message to Congress, now in session, urging repeal of the duties on the products controlled by the trust, or such legislation as may bring relief to the people generally.

In another issue a leading Democratic paper a few days ago had the following:

But the duties on foreign meats can be removed immediately.

Why should this relief to the people be delayed a single day?

President Roosevelt has it in his power to drive to the rear the Republican leaders who are helping the food trust to empty the workingman's dinner pail and to make meager the fare of the workingman's family.

Repeal of the meat duties would give results at once. Send in a special message, Mr. Roosevelt. Hit the food trust through the tariff.

How refreshing this belated Democratic interest in the "workingman's dinner pail."

Now, Mr. Chairman, conceding that most of the recent increase in the price of meat to the consumer is indefensible, that it is an evil that ought to be remedied, let us examine for a moment the proposed remedy.

First. The proposal to remove the duties upon dressed meats. Let it be understood that neither the tariff upon dressed meats nor live stock has been increased during the last five years. The tariff is precisely the same now as before the recent increase. The rates of tariff upon dressed meat are as follows:

	Cents.
Fresh beef, veal, mutton, and pork ..... per pound...	2
Poultry, live ..... do....	3
Poultry, dressed ..... do....	5

Are these tariff duties the cause of the recent rise in meat? Why have these prices gone up so enormously while the tariff has remained stationary? How much cheaper would tenderloin steak that sells in Eastern cities for $1 per pound be if the tariff of 2 cents per pound were removed? Ordinary beefsteaks sell for 30 cents per pound retail. How much would these be cheapened by removing a tariff duty of 2 cents per pound?

The retail price of dressed poultry within a short time has increased from 12 cents to 40 cents per pound. How much cheaper would that be if the tariff duty of 5 cents per pound were removed.

Who are making these enormous profits? What is the cause of this enormous increase in prices? Who are receiving them? Certainly not the men who grow, raise, and feed live stock. The highest market price for dressed beef, mutton, and pork in the cities of the West during the present year has not exceeded 9 cents per pound. The increase in the last sixty days in the price of fresh meats paid to the producers has not exceeded 2 cents per pound. On the other hand, during the last few days, the decrease in the use of meats through the increased price has destroyed the sale for cattle. A leading Democratic paper, on the 2d of this month, contained the following dispatch:

REFUSAL TO EAT MEAT CAUSES $500,000 LOSS—STOCK RAISERS AND INDUSTRIES IDENTIFIED WITH THE CATTLE TRADE FEEL THE COUNTRY'S RESENTMENT AGAINST THE TRUST.

Depreciation in the price of cattle and reduction in consumption during the last three days are said on the most trustworthy authority to have resulted in a loss of $200,000 to the live-stock raisers adjacent to Chicago. Taking in the other industries closely identified with the cattle trade, the loss is said to run over $500,000.

In Rockford, Ill., where the conditions are said to be a sample of those in other cities in northern Illinois, the demand for meat has fallen off 37½ per cent. The packers' men, asked about the reductions, refuse to impart any information. They say they have not been able to secure figures on which to base an accurate estimate.

One of the largest packers in the business, and admittedly one of the best-posted cattlemen in the United States, said:

"Business to-day is the worst I ever saw; it is simply paralyzed. In fact, there is no business at all for the packing houses. If this agitation and falling off in consumption continue, I don't know what will happen. Certain it is that if the agitation continues the worst is yet to come."

When returns begin to come in from the far West the great reduction in consumption, with the consequent depreciation in cattle values, it is asserted, will run into the millions.

Commission men at the stock yards to-day blocked the further fall in cattle prices by telegraphing to shippers to hold their cattle until the market strengthened. The receipts to-day were only 6,000 head to the 18,000 head of yesterday. The packers continued their policy of yesterday, buying only the animals necessary to fill immediate orders.

"The yards have not been so lifeless since the panic of 1893," was the comment of the commission men to-day. The cattle that were sold brought yesterday's prices, 25 cents a hundredweight lower than those of Tuesday. Hogs fell 10 cents lower.

Another Chicago dispatch of April 30 states that because of the falling off in the demand for dressed meats "Chicago packers have discharged hundreds of men." "In nearly all the big plants large numbers of men are being laid off."

The condition of the meat trade of Boston on May 2 and 3 is shown by the following:

DECREASED CONSUMPTION OF BEEF.

Twelve cars of dressed beef were received at Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week. The receipts for the two corresponding days a year ago were 87 cars. It is evident that Bostonians and the people in the vicinity of their city are not patronizing the beef trust so extensively as they have been in the habit of doing.

What is true of Boston is true also of nearly the entire country. An advance in the price of any commodity so notable as the advance in the price of beef has been necessarily brings with it a decrease in consumption.

Yet with this demoralization of the cattle market the following appeared in the New York Tribune of Sunday, May 4, under the heading—

HIGHER PRICED RESTAURANTS MAKE 20 CENTS MORE THAN USUAL ON STEAKS.

A pound of tenderloin beefsteak cooked and served in a restaurant that has raised prices is sold to the consumer at an increase of about 25 cents in the price. This means that the purveyor makes 20 cents more on every pound of steak than he did before the trust raised prices.

On the same day the New York American and Journal contained the following:

NO RELIEF IN SIGHT FOR CONSUMERS IN GREATER NEW YORK.

From the legal standpoint, the local war against the food trust was at a standstill yesterday.

From the consumers' standpoint the situation was about as bad as ever, retail prices of meats remaining at about the same figures as during the week.

Fresh pork is the only meat staple that sees an approach to reasonable prices. Ham and bacon and other pork products remain at abnormally high prices, while beef and lamb of all varieties are still beyond the reach of lean pocketbooks.

Eight dealers said yesterday that women who conduct dining rooms and boarding houses frequently leave the shops in tears after learning that the high prices remain firm. The present prices threaten the boarding-house keepers with ruin.

5,000 MEN PROPOSE TO BUY NO TRUST MEATS FOR THIRTY DAYS.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y., May 3, 1902.

The Amsterdam Central Labor Union, composed of 25 subordinate unions, with a total membership of 5,000, has adopted a resolution to abstain from the use of meat handled by the meat trust for the next thirty days.

The Washington Post of Sunday contains the following:

MEAT GOES UP AGAIN—ANOTHER INCREASE IN PRICE OF BEEF MADE BY THE PACKERS.

Yesterday saw another advance in the price of beef in the local market, and with the increase came a corresponding advance in the price of substitute commodities. The figures, which had already been unprecedentedly high for meat, were sent up farther by the wholesale people, who were followed, though not to an equal degree, by the retail dealers about the city. These latter were notified yesterday that meat would cost $1 more a hundred, while with this came from other sources information, direct and indirect, of a prospective increase in the price of poultry in the coming week of about a cent a pound.

Retail dealers are inclined to take a very gloomy view of the situation. As a rule, they find very little comfort in the high prices prevailing. There is little, if any, more money in it for them, while a larger outlay is necessary, and, in addition, there is the public discontent to meet.

Regarding the present additional advance, as in the case of the preceding raises, the representatives of the packing interests are disinclined to speak. Those who will talk, however, volunteer no hope for a lowering of prices in the near future.

It is evident the farmer and stockman, the producer of meats, is not getting the benefit of this increase in price. The small additional amount paid to him does not more than cover the cost of feeding, growing out of the scarcity of corn and higher-priced feed. On the contrary, he has been made the victim of decreased consumption. While there has certainly been a great increase in the price of fresh meats to the consumer, the highest price paid for fresh dressed beef to the farmer and stockman in the city of Portland, Oreg., during the year has been 8½ cents per pound, 1 cent higher than at a corresponding period one year ago.

The recent Summary of Commerce and Finance, published by the Treasury Department, gives "the top prices per 100 pounds for cattle on the hoof for each week" at the Chicago stock yards since January 2, 1897. I select the prices at the end of the first week in April and May of each year:

Year.	Native steers.	Texas steers.	Cows.
1897.
April 3	$5.40	$4.45	$4.30
May 1	5.40	4.50	4.40
1898.
April 2	5.50	4.55	4.10
May 7	5.25	4.40	4.15
1899.
April 1	5.80	4.85	4.35
May 6	5.50	4.90	4.80
1900.
April 7	5.80	5.00	4.85
May 5	5.75	5.10	4.80
1901.
April 6	6.25	5.30	4.75
May 4	6.10	5.25	4.85
1902.
April 5	7.50	6.10	6.00
April 12	7.40	6.10	6.00
April 19	7.50	6.00	6.30
April 26	7.50	6.50	6.50

This is the end of the official record, but the quotations from responsible newspapers for April 30 of this year, from the Chicago market, are as follows:

Market slow and 15 to 25 cents lower; good to prime steers, $7.75 to $7.80; fair to medium, $4.50 to $6.40; stockers and feeders, $2.50 to $5; cows, $1.40 to $6; canners, $1.25 to $2.50; calves, $2 to $5.35; Texas steers, $5.25 to $6.25.

Prices the 10th instant are practically the same.

The increase in the prices paid to the stockmen in Chicago in April and May, 1902, is from 80 cents to $1.25 per 100 pounds, or practically an average of 1 cent per pound.

Who is getting the remainder of the increased cost to the consumer from 12 to 25 cents per pound? Who are responsible for this unusual increase in the retail price? There can be but one answer. There is but one answer. It is the wealthy corporations who own the great slaughtering establishments, who own the great packing houses, refrigerating plants, refrigerating cars, and who, according to the New York American and Journal, "enjoy discriminating transportation rates," and who control absolutely the slaughter, sale, and distribution of all classes of fresh meats, who in 1901 bought, slaughtered, and sold 15,000,000 head of cattle, sheep, and hogs.

They name and control alike the prices charged to the consumer and the prices paid to the producer, the farmer and stockman. They are the enemies of both, and plunder both with perfect impartiality. The owner of cattle can find no market but such as they offer. There is scarcely a retail butcher in the land who would not be ruined should he dare to purchase a dressed beef from the farmer who raised and slaughtered it. These are the men who have organized and compose the so-called "food trust," who, while robbing the consumer, distressing the poor, and starving the hungry, are stopping the consumption of meats, destroying the market for cattle, and sending distress to the homes of the men who depend upon the sale of their cattle and live stock for daily bread. They depress prices paid to the owner of live stock and increase the price of meats to the consumer.

A Republican Administration proposes to strike this trust through the courts under existing laws, which they are openly defying and contemptuously violating. Its action is sending consternation into the ranks of the conspirators. But our Democratic friends, on the contrary, propose to strike not the culprits, but the victims; not to cripple the trust, but to help it; not to relieve its victims, but to bind at least one class still firmer in its clutches. What cares the trust for free meat or free cattle? It produces neither. It buys both, slaughters, dresses, preserves meats, and puts them upon the block of the retailer. It wants to buy where it can buy cheapest. It wants a wide market in which to purchase its supplies. It would welcome the removal of duties both on cattle and dressed meat as much as Havemeyer would welcome the removal of the duties upon unrefined sugar.

Both trusts want "free raw material." Controlling, as the meat trust does, every great slaughtering establishment, every great packing house, refrigerating plant, and refrigerating cars, and "discriminating transportation rates," and practically the freedom of every retail butcher in the land, does anyone suppose for one moment that the removal of the duties upon dressed meats would enable any foreign butcher to invade the dominion of the trust, interfere with its trade, diminish its sales, or supply the retailer? On the contrary, the removal of these duties upon dressed meats and upon cattle would tend to render the trust more independent of the home producer of live stock. Does anyone seriously expect to cripple the trust by extending and cheapening the market in which it buys its supplies?

Under these conditions, what relief would the removal of tariff upon fresh meats give to the consumer? We do not import; we have not for years imported fresh meats in any considerable quantities. The importations of that, as past experience shows, has not been affected by the tariff. Prior to 1890 there was no tariff on mutton or veal. The tariff on beef and pork was 1 cent per pound. Under the tariff law of October 1, 1890, there was no tariff on veal, while the tariff on beef, mutton, and pork was 2 cents per pound.

Under the Wilson bill there was no tariff on veal, while the tariff on beef, mutton, and pork was 20 per cent ad valorem. Under the present law the tariff on beef, veal, mutton, and pork is 2 cents per pound. This variation of the tariff has had practically no influence whatever upon the importation of fresh meats. The importation of meats and meat extracts under these several tariffs have been as follows:

In 1890	$407,038
In 1891, with a marked increase of tariff	521,322
In 1895, after a lowering of the tariff	479,336
In 1901, with the tariff again increased	407,003

In this last year less than $60,000 was paid for fresh beef, mutton, pork, veal, and poultry. The remainder was paid for various "extracts" and "preserved meats." This shows how absolutely the great packing houses control the sale and distribution of dressed meats.

The United States exports enormous quantities of dressed meats. It imports practically none. Remove all of the duties from all forms of dressed meats, and there would be no increase in importation. The proposal to remove the evil growing out of the recent high prices by removing this tariff seems so entirely inadequate that it is hard to conceive that those who propose it believe that it will have any beneficial result whatever.

A Republican Attorney-General, under the directions and with the advice of a Republican President, proposes a different and, as I believe, a much more efficacious proceeding. The President and Attorney-General believe it is not the farmer and the stock raiser, but the great trusts and combinations owning and controlling the slaughtering establishments and refrigerating plants, and controlling the slaughtering, preservation, and distribution of meats, that by an unholy combination and agreement have forced up prices unjustifiably and in defiance of public opinion, good conscience, and the laws of the United States. They are instituting proceedings under the antitrust laws to dissolve these combinations in restraint of trade. This is the practical remedy, and the only practical remedy.

It is strange how suddenly our Democratic friends have become imbued with the idea that neither Congress nor the Administration can do anything to repress trusts. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT], on that side of the House, in a speech made a few days ago in Jersey City, as reported by the New York Herald, is said to have made the following statement:

There is no power in the President and there is none in the Attorney-General to suppress monopoly. At best, the States which create these institutions can impose fines for a violation of charters, and what is a fine to a band of conspirators who, without heart or conscience, are in the business of wringing, with greedy hands, millions of the public?

Men and newspapers may suggest remedies, but there will never be any remedy until the National Government has the sole power to grant life to corporations which do an interstate business and until it has power to take away that life for good cause.

For the purpose of accomplishing this end, I have introduced an amend- to the Federal Constitution, which, in my judgment and the judgment of others who have examined it, is the way to remedy the great evil about which the whole country is now crying.

Take down that tariff wall and let in the mutton of Canada and the beef of Mexico and I believe you will accomplish at least something, though, perhaps, the only substantial and permanent remedy is Federal control of Federal corporations.

A year ago, on this side of the House, we proposed to amend the Federal Constitution so as to give Congress the power to regulate trusts. The amendment failed to secure the necessary two-thirds vote because of a solid Democratic opposition. Now, when the Republican Administration proposes to appeal to the laws upon the statute books, passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President, to repress the most iniquitous trust that ever existed and to grant a suffering people immediate relief, the Democracy suddenly discovers that the Federal Government is powerless to control trusts, and that "there is no power in the President and there is none in the Attorney-General to suppress monopoly," and suddenly discovers the necessity of amending the Federal Constitution!

The trusts that are made defendants do not share the confidence of the gentleman from New Jersey. We are told by the leading newspapers that the action of the Government "has caused alarm among the packers."

Mr. Chairman, the proposition to remove the tariff on fresh meat alone would alarm no one, but the Democracy does not propose to stop there. It seeks to take advantage of the distress caused by those increased prices to urge other remedies that would be disastrous, that would be far-reaching, and would fall with crushing weight upon the farmers and stock raisers of the United States, and particularly in the great West.

They do not propose to stop by the removal of the duties upon meats. They are advocating the removal of the duties upon all "food stuffs in daily use," and particularly upon cattle and sheep. Let it be understood that whatever the condition of the tariff, we do not import well-fed animals ready for the block. No other nation competes with the farmers of the great Middle West in the ability to take unfed cattle and fatten and prepare them for market.

From the Pacific coast young stock—sheep as well as cattle—drift eastward, are grazed upon the ranges of Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, and other mountain States, and drift still farther eastward to be fed upon the corn of Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and Illinois, and there prepared for market. To remove the duty on cattle and sheep would be to fill the feeding pens and cornfields of the Middle West with unfed animals from other countries now as in 1895 and 1896. The stockman and farmer of the Pacific coast, from the Western States, could not compete with the stockman of Mexico, with the advantage of milder climate, cheaper land and labor, in supplying stockers and feeders. The removal of this duty would strike with unusual severity upon the great live-stock industry on the Pacific coast and of the entire West.

But a removal of the duties upon meats and live stock is not all that "united Democracy" contemplates. Mark the words, "food stuffs in daily use." It is but a short time ago we listened to a distinguished member of the other side of the House, then the floor leader of Democracy, in discussing tariff problems, use this language:

A tax upon consumption must always be unjust.

The necessaries of life ought to bear no burden at all, or at least they ought to bear as little as is consistent with the necessities of the Government.

Placing the necessaries of life on the free list is not, as some seem to suppose, an appeal to the selfishness of the masses, but it is an effort to approximate justice under an unjust system. I am so fully persuaded that it is our duty whenever possible to remove all taxes from the necessaries of life that I will never consent to place upon the free list any article which is bought purely for the sake of making profit out of it until we have first taken all taxes off of those articles which the poor are compelled to buy in order to be comfortable and decent.

In the vocabulary of this orator, the taxes referred to were duties upon imports. "The necessaries of life," "those articles which the poor are compelled to buy in order to be comfortable and decent" include every product of the farm, the range, the orchard, the garden, the field, the forest, and the flock. They involve every industry of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and of the entire Northwest. To remove the tariff duties from all of these is to remove the tariff duties upon every agricultural product of the State of Oregon, upon the products of its forests, of its flocks and herds, its gardens and orchards, and the coal from its mines.

The duties from these are to be wholly removed before there is to be any reduction upon "any article which is bought purely for the sake of making profit." But articles bought for the purpose of making profit include everything to be purchased by the American farmer. Upon these the duty is not only being maintained, but it will necessarily be increased to supply the taxes removed from agricultural products. Taxes must be levied. Revenues must be collected. Governments must be maintained. There are no resources from which this money can be raised except by methods of taxation. It is conceded on all sides that the simplest, the most expeditious, and the least burdensome method of collecting taxes is by imposing and collecting duties upon imports.

The Democrats of Oregon have just declared in favor of a "tariff for revenue only." When these duties are levied upon foreign goods competing with our own it affords incidental protection to the American products. Under the policy now proposed all of this incidental protection and the increased price is to be retained, or rather increased, upon the goods which farmers buy, and the whole of it to be removed from the goods which farmers produce and sell.

Mr. Chairman, this is not only a return to the policy of the Wilson bill, which brought such widespread ruin, but goes further than that. In the Wilson bill some measure of tariff duties was levied upon live stock and agricultural products and some measure of protection accorded to the home products. Now even this is to be swept away. Why is all this? Is this the first fruit of reunited Democracy? Is this the first and greatest effort to be made by the Democratic party, to abandon its friends in the West, in order to seek new alliances in the East? Is this the policy contemplated by the Democratic legislature of Mississippi under the lead of McAlister? Is this what a recent Democratic journal of that State means by the use of the following language—

That will be one step toward a reconciliation with our former good and potent friends of the East, whom we treated so shabbily in two national conventions. We must go to them, exclaiming, like the prodigal son, "We have sinned against heaven and against you, and are no longer worthy to be called your brethren." Yet will they receive us with open arms, notwithstanding that they are "bloated bondholders" and we but "bonded bloatholders," a state of affairs due mainly to the closely nipped grass in the Populist pasture, where we have been grazing for so many years.

Does the prodigal propose to celebrate his return to his former "potent" friends—his "bloated bondholder's" friends—by sacrificing and destroying the industries of that class of people, for which during the past few years he has professed such devoted and undying friendship?

And yet these entire duties, not only upon fresh meats, not only upon all classes of live stock, but upon all "foodstuffs in daily use," must be at once removed. It must be done now. "An emergency" exists. We can wait to remove the duties from products of trusts, but not from products of farm and range. "This is an occasion that demands dispatch." They demand "results at once." "Why should this relief to the people be delayed a single day?"

In other words, that while the entire country is prosperous, while increased prices prevail everywhere, when every wheel is turning, when every factory is running at its full capacity, when every laboring man is employed at increased wages, at a time when there is not a producer of any product within the United States that does not have a full and ready market at increased prices, the whole power of the Government must be invoked to strike down the prices of the products of the farm, the field, the orchard, and the range. This is the real meaning of the Democratic cry of "cheaper foods for the masses."

A few days ago the oleomargarine bill, as amended in the Senate, came before the House. In order to take it up it was necessary to adopt a special rule. On a rising vote 101 members voted for it and 76 voted against it. I did not observe a member on the Democratic side arise to his feet to vote for the rule or a Republican on this side who voted against it. On a roll call there were 153 voted for it and 79 against it. On roll call a few Democrats from dairy districts voted "aye" and a very few Republicans from cattle districts voted "no." It was practically a solid Republican vote for and a solid Democratic vote against. The chief burden of the Democratic song in opposition to this bill was that it made the price of butter too high.

Mr. COWHERD, who, from his name, should have been on the other side, leads the Democratic hosts. He complains:

> The price of butter has been put up by this legislation which you are now enacting against the table of the poor people of the United States. When food products were never so high, when butter was never at such a high price, and when butter makers were never so prosperous, there is not only no need of this legislation, but it is a little short of, I had almost said, infamous.

This bill, it will be remembered, was simply to prevent the makers of oleomargarine from fraudulently selling it as butter to those who wanted only butter and who would not knowingly buy oleomargarine. But this fraud must not be suppressed for fear that thereby there should be an increase in the price of creamery butter to the farmer and dairyman.

Mr. Chairman, what have the farmers done to deserve this attack? While cheerfully paying an increased price for every purchase he makes, why should the farmer not have his share in existing prosperity? Why should there not be some increase of price in the products he has to sell as well as in those he has to buy? Let us see the probable effect of the blow, and where and upon whom it would fall.

We are not left without some experience in legislation in line with that now proposed. Prior to the passage of the McKinley bill we were importing into the United States annually from 50,000 to 60,000 head of cattle. Under the provisions of that law the tariff upon such importations was materially decreased while it was in effect. The importation of cattle decreased from 64,371 in 1888 to 1,280 during the year ending June 30, 1894. But while the importation decreased in such a marked degree, exports increased from 140,208 head in 1888 to 384,607 head in 1892. Under the last three years of the McKinley bill we imported 7,058 head of cattle and exported 1,040,970 head. In other words, under the last three years of the McKinley bill we exported 1,033,924 head of cattle more than we imported. This was not the only effect of the encouragement to the cattle industry by the protection afforded by that bill.

Under the lower duties of the Wilson bill, during the last three years of its operation, we imported 696,584 head of cattle and exported 1,096,373 head. The decrease in exports of cattle, meat, and dairy products was, in value, $10,481,741 less in 1895 than in 1892.

Under three years of the McKinley bill we exported 1,033,924 head of cattle more than we imported.

Under the three years of the Wilson bill we exported 396,790 head of cattle more than we imported.

Under the Administration of President Harrison and the operation of the McKinley bill cattle increased in the United States in number 2,764,528.

Under the Administration of President Cleveland and the operation of the Wilson bill cattle in the United States decreased in number 6,617,555. The effect upon the sheep industry was practically the same. Under protection, imports of live stock decrease, exports increase, and our flocks and herds increase in numbers.

Under the Administration of President Harrison and the McKinley tariff sheep in the United States increased in numbers 4,674,474 and in value $34,268,895.

Under the Administration of President Cleveland and the operation of the Wilson bill sheep decreased in number 10,454,910 and in value $60,741,529. Remove protection to live stock, and imports increase, exports decrease, and flocks and herds diminish.

It is needless to dwell upon the depression of the live-stock industry during the last Democratic Administration. Under the protection afforded by the Dingley law it has rapidly revived. While the importations have largely decreased, the exports have largely increased. Instead of importing 328,773 head of cattle—the amount imported under the last year of the Wilson bill—our importations last year had fallen to 144,773. Our exports of cattle had increased from 372,461 head in 1896 to 459,218 head in 1901, and at a value of $37,566,980.

During the last three years our excess of exports of cattle over imports have been 722,132 head, while our exports of meat and dairy products have increased from $133,377,549 in 1896 to $196,959,637 in 1901, and live stock from $41,840,969 to $52,058,876.

Under the operations of the Wilson bill there was a steady increase in the value of our imports of live stock, a steady decrease in the amount of our exports of live stock, meat, and dairy products.

Under the present law there has been a marked and steady decrease in the importations of live stock, a still more marked and steady increase in the value of the exports of live stock, meat, and dairy products.

I have pointed out with some particularity the effect of the several tariff laws upon the domestic live-stock industry. This but illustrates the general effects upon the entire agricultural interests of the United States.

It is well known that the principal tariff reductions made in the Wilson bill were upon the importation of live stock and agricultural products. The greatest difference of duties between that law and the present is upon this class of imports. The effect of the two laws can be seen in the imports and exports of these productions. I give the imports and exports of agricultural products for the last six years ending with June 30, 1901, including the last two years of the life of the Wilson law, and the full four years under the Dingley law, and which are as follows:

Year.	Agricultural imports.	Agricultural exports.
1896	$391,029,407	$574,398,264
1897	400,871,468	689,755,193
1898	314,291,796	859,018,946
1899	355,514,881	702,811,733
1900	420,139,288	814,616,530
1901	391,931,051	951,628,331

During the last four years the American market for food products has been the best and largest in the world. The increase of the home consumption over the previous years is beyond computation. Through the proper guarding of this market by the protection accorded under the Dingley law the importations of agricultural products decreased upon an average of $22,000,000 a year. The exports of agricultural products during the four years ending June 30, 1901, reached an annual average of $827,568,147, against an annual average of agricultural exports for the previous four years of $638,748,318.

The increase in the price of agricultural products and the prosperity of the American farmer has not been the result of unholy combinations, grinding monopolists, or billion-dollar trusts. The prices of farm products have been sold in our open markets in healthful American competition. The owners of 5,739,657 farms have been competitors in the sale of their products, each standing upon its merits, and each offering his products for what it would fairly bring. With present protection the farmer is subject to more competition than the men engaged in any other business in the United States.

The total imports of all classes of goods into the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, amounted to $823,172,165. Of this sum, $391,931,051, almost one-half the total, consisted of agricultural products. Under the Wilson law more than one-half our total imports were agricultural products. Does this indicate too much protection for the farmer? The total exports of the United States during the same year, all classes, amounted to $1,464,462,806. Of this sum, the agricultural exports amounted to $951,628,331, or more than two-thirds of the entire exports, sold in open competition with all the world. Do the men who add this much to the nation's wealth deserve this severe attack? Are they not entitled to fair protection in the home market?

Suddenly, within the past few days, the Democratic party, heretofore so loud in its professions of friendship for the farmer, has become jealous of his moderate prosperity. It begins an organized and systematic attack on food products constituting the distinctive productions of the farmer. They are too high. The price received is too great. They must be put upon the free list, not next year, not under general tariff revision, but now. It is "an emergency." Immediate relief is demanded. The remedy must be "expeditious." It must be "immediate." There must be "results at once." Delay must not be "a single day."

There is not time to wait for other tariff revision. "This is an occasion that demands dispatch." The tariff upon goods manufactured by wealthy trusts, the tariff upon machinery, upon clothing, upon every product that the farmer buys, must remain the same, but the tariff upon the goods which the farmer sells must be stricken off. The trusts are to have peace from Democratic attack. "There is no power in the President and there is none in the Attorney-General to suppress monopoly." And so the power of Congress to "suppress the price of farm products must be invoked."

It is the old issue, but modified. The old cry—protected manufactured goods, free raw materials, with an exception. Free coal is in doubt until the manufacturer has been heard from, but free iron ore is abandoned. The entire attack of tariff reform is centered upon the cry for "free food products," and the miner and manufacturer must be tempted to join in the attempt to despoil the food producer and bring about "the immediate repeal of the tariff on all meats and food stuffs in daily use."

Mr. Chairman, I recall listening to a very able and very eloquent speech delivered in this House upon the passage of the Dingley act by the gentleman from Texas, then the minority leader, and now a Senator of the United States. That very eloquent gentleman denounced as undemocratic the position previously assumed by his party in favor of the admission of free raw materials. He insisted that it was a new doctrine imported into the party by the friends of ex-President Cleveland. He used the following language:

> Up to the time that Mr. Cleveland was first inaugurated President in 1885, nobody ever dreamed that the Democratic party would advocate a proposition to exempt the manufacturers of this country from their fair share of taxation.
> Again, it requires no special wisdom to discern that it was the same influences which came so near pledging our party to the maintenance of the single gold standard that committed it to the doctrine of free raw materials and taxed finished products. It was that strange infatuation which was willing to sacrifice Democratic principles in the party to secure mugwump votes. * * *
> They were so eager to make New England Democratic that they forgot our immutable opposition to special favors, and they offered the manufacturers of the East the valuable privilege of buying their materials at free-trade prices and selling their finished products at protection prices. That was a temptation which the rock-ribbed Republicanism of New England could not withstand, and when I first entered Congress, six years ago, the entire delegations from both Rhode Island and New Hampshire were Democratic, three out of the four members from Connecticut were Democratic, and there were five Democrats from Massachusetts. * * *
> Whatever strength this advocacy of free raw materials may have brought to the Democratic party in the past, it can bring none now, and will not bring any in the future. There are not in all this broad land to-day, 100 men who could be induced to vote the Democratic ticket for the sake of free raw materials, as long as the Democratic party holds to the free coinage of silver; while on the other hand, there were thousands of brave and honest men throughout the Western States, who, agreeing with us upon the great financial question, will embrace our tariff doctrine when we have thoroughly repudiated this Cleveland heresy.

Mr. Chairman, what a strange arraignment of the Democratic party by one of its great leaders and one who is prominently mentioned as its next candidate for the Presidency. He charges that his party was willing to sell out the West in order to procure votes in New England and in the East. Then alleging that such a course of conduct, while the party advocated free coinage of silver, could no longer be profitable, could no longer bring votes, he was intent upon making friends and political alliances with those "thousands of brave and honest men throughout the Western States" who were willing to vote for free coinage when the party abandoned its attitude in favor of free trade in the products of the West and tariff upon manufactured goods.

Now the party is going back to its old idols. The men whom the distinguished gentleman charges with leading the party away from its old landmarks are again obtaining control. The reign of King Bryan I is over. They are looking for a new king, a new leader, whose star is in the East. They are again attempting to renew the alliance with Eastern cities "in the hope of securing mugwump votes." In order to do this they are ostentatiously abandoning the interests of the West, are complaining of what they choose to term "their past follies," are begging forgiveness of their Eastern friends, and the better to prove the sincerety of their conversion, propose to slaughter the industrial interests of their late allies.

To the men whom they so lately praised and courted, the "brave and honest men throughout the Western States," they offer, not as they offered then and offer now to the East, "the valuable privileges of buying their materials at free-trade prices and selling their finished products at protection prices," but they threaten to compel the farmers and stockmen of the West to buy in a protected market and to sell their entire productions in a free-trade market in open competition with all the world.

Mr. Chairman, is it impossible for the Democratic party to be approximately right on two questions at the same time? A few years ago, when professing undying friendship for the Western farmer, it coupled this with the advocacy of financial measures which, while aimed at the creditor, would have overwhelmed all classes in irretrievable ruin. Now, while abandoning its financial heresies, it couples return to sound financial principles with an unprecedented attack upon farmers and stockmen, the people for whom it expressed such great concern.

Will the Democratic party never cease looking for political advantage by arraying one class of its countrymen against another? Will it ever attain to that elevation from which it can see that the welfare of all classes, of one people, living under one law and under one flag, is inseparably interwoven, that to strike down one is to strike down all, and that the highest statesmanship seeks to foster and maintain the equal prosperity of all the people of all the land?

I protest against this threatened attack, this contemplated injustice. I warn my friends upon that side of the House that their experience of a few years ago, the attack then made upon farm products, produced a result that was not expected, that ought not to be repeated. The hoped-for benefits did not come. The manufacturers of the East were charmed with the prospect of free raw material, cheaper food for their employees, protected manufactured goods. To secure this purpose the East allied itself with the Democracy. Even Massachusetts went Democratic. The legislation was secured. "Free raw materials" was conceded. But what was the result? The ruin of American agriculture, the widespread distress among American farmers, the foreclosures of mortgages, depression in the value of farm property and live stock, carried with it the destruction of the markets for American manufactured goods.

The Southern producers of cotton and corn did not escape. Demand for labor ceased, millions of hands were idle and millions of men hungry. The great railroads of the country believed that free trade in farm products would increase enormously exports and imports; that the traffic upon the railroads, taking freight from the farm and returning manufactured goods, would enormously swell the earnings of this class of corporations. What was the result? Bankruptcy everywhere and a large number of railroad corporations in the hands of receivers.

The American farmer is the basis of American prosperity. He is the greatest purchaser of the products of its looms and its factories. Directly and indirectly, in the men he employs and in the market he furnishes for the productions of labor, the American farmer is beyond doubt the greatest employer and the best friend of labor the world contains. He is the greatest contributor to the national wealth. Destroy his prosperity, diminish materially his purchasing power, and there will be, there can be, no prosperity to any other productive class within the United States.

Bring disaster upon him, and you bring disaster upon every industry within every section of the land. The fire in the furnace will die out, the smoke of the factory will disappear, the music of the wheels will cease, willing hands will be idle, and the days of the soup house will return. Turn the hand of labor against the farmer, and it will strike down its best friend, its chief support. Markets for manufactured goods and demand for factory labor will largely cease. The Southern planter will find less demand for cotton goods and less market for the meat fattened with Southern corn. The welfare and prosperity of the farmer and the laborer are "one and inseparable," "now and forever." He is an enemy of his country and of mankind who would raise up discord between them. They have never prospered, they have never suffered, in a business way, except side by side. Well-paid labor bringing prosperity for one enables him to pay good prices for increased food supplies produced by the farmer.

The prosperity of the farmer determines the demand for labor. In a few weeks there is to be an election in the State of Oregon, a State whose entire business welfare is interwoven with and dependent upon the prosperity of the agricultural and live-stock interests. The contest is between the Republican and Democratic parties. What is it that you ask of the voter who contemplates voting the Democratic ticket and supporting the Democratic canditates and Democratic policies? You are not content with asking him to join with you in an effort to tear down the flag where it has been erected upon American Territory by the courage of American soldiers.

You are not content with asking him to defile the national honor, to lend his indorsement to the vile slanders that are now being daily uttered upon the floor of the other end of this Capitol against the Army of the United States and against the men who are daily risking their lives to maintain the honor of the flag and the supremacy of the American authority. You not only ask him to indorse the conduct of those men who, standing in their places in the United States Senate, shower fulsome praises upon men who torture American soldiers by slow fires, hack prisoners to a lingering death with their bolos, bury our wounded prisoners while still living, announce to their followers to spare no white man, but who have no word of praise or encouragement for the American soldiers, American institutions, American Government, or anything pertaining to America.

But you also ask the voters of that State to deliberately deal a deadly blow to their own business interests and to stand by and support that political party which openly threatens to despoil them of their share of that prosperity which, under Republican laws, administered by Republican Administrations, is now enjoyed by all classes of the people in all sections of our common country.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that the present tariff laws ought to be and will be revised. Their schedules are not sacred, are not intended to be, and will not be eternal. They should be changed to meet changed conditions. Not conditions that are temporary or transient or largely local, but conditions that promise some degree of permanency. I believe there are wealthy corporations for whose productions the American market is preserved by protective duties, who are exacting unreasonable prices from American consumers. If these conditions promise continuance, as I believe they do, such duties should be materially lowered or entirely removed. But such revision, when revision comes, must be equitable and fair to all sections of the country and to all classes of its citizens. It must not destroy the prosperity of all to decrease the profits of a part of the people.

Above all, it must not discriminate against our agricultural industries that contribute more to the national wealth than any other industry that concern the prosperity of the most peaceable, the most law-abiding, the most industrious, and the most patriotic people that dwell under the Stars and Stripes. Against this threatened Democratic attack upon the business interests and prosperity of the most numerous and industrious class of our citizens, the Republican party stands for the equal and fair protection of every legitimate American industry and the business prosperity of all classes of the American people.

For the vindication of these principles, faithfully embodied into laws, passed by Republican Congress, and administered by Republican Presidents, I submit for the consideration and judgment of the American people, with their own memories and observations as witnesses, the widespread and universal prosperity of 1902 against the equally widespread and universal calamity of 1895. These conditions, not theories, have been witnessed, experienced, suffered, and are known by us all.

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LESSLER].

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, I sometimes wonder, when I listen to speeches about soldiers in the Philippines if it would not be wise to send a deputation to the Democratic leader and inform him, and the gentlemen under him, that they were elected by an American constituency of the United States of America, and that they are not the representatives of the natives of the island of Guam or the district of Samar.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if I had a son who had gone wrong, I would be the last one of those who would publish it abroad. If he has done a wrong I want to take him somewhere near to my heart and protect him if necessary even against myself. To me it seems very much like the old saying of "a bird fouling its own nest," to hear the American soldier upbraided and slandered and vilified without a word of defense in the one place on the American continent that he ought to be defended—the House of Representatives of the United States of America. [Applause.]

I want to serve notice now, for one, that when the time comes that we investigate what our soldiers have done or have not done, sons of men here, brothers of men here, suckled by mothers like yours, American boys and American citizens, most of us will be willing and ready and able to acquit on any testimony. I sometimes think that if you would knock at the door of one of these gentlemen in the long hours of the morning, when the time of sleep has come and the time to rest from their arduous labors of finding something to fling at their own countrymen—if you would knock at their door you would find them singing "Aguinaldo," or "the Filipinos."

It is time that we should pay some attention to our own people. It is time that in the House of Representatives of the American Congress we should look to our own "boys in blue" and be as proud of them as we were in the early history of this country or in the war of the rebellion—be as proud of them now, when they are 10,000 miles away from home—not men who have run away from their post of duty—not men who have gone out of the Army to tell any number of lies to further a political interest.

I beg to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to a Senate document which they seem to ignore all the time—the report relating to the charges of cruelty to the natives of the Philippines. I want to read from this document the utterance of one of the best and most high-minded men that this country holds, a man who has given up as much to do his duty to his country with honor as any man to-day in the city of Washington—Hon. Elihu Root. No broader-minded American, no lovelier gentleman, no grander man to follow when duty to country calls is there in the United States than Elihu Root. And when that man puts his name to a document he puts it there because he tells the truth. He is not a critic, not a tearer down, but a man who is helping to upbuild and uplift, and who, in the opening of this twentieth century, must be reckoned as one of the great men of our time. I beg to read from this Senate document, and, mind you, I have this document in my hands so that you can look at it when called for. It is entitled Senate Document No. 205, part 1:

The war on the part of the Filipinos has been conducted with the barbarous cruelty common among uncivilized races, and with general disregard of the rules of civilized warfare. They deliberately adopted the policy of killing all natives, however peaceful, who were friendly to our Government, and in literally thousands of instances these poor creatures, dependent upon our soldiers for protection, have been assassinated.

The Filipino troops have frequently fired upon our men from under protection of flags of truce, tortured to death American prisoners who have fallen into their hands, buried alive both Americans and friendly natives, and horribly mutilated the bodies of the American dead. That the soldiers fighting against such an enemy, and with their own eyes witnessing such deeds, should occasionally be regardless of their orders and retaliate by unjustifiable severities is not incredible. Such things happen in every war, even between two civilized nations, and they always will happen while war lasts. That such occurrences have been sanctioned or permitted is not true. A constant and effective pressure of prohibition, precept, and discipline has been maintained against them.

That there has been any such practice is not true. The cases have been few and far between, scattered infrequently over a great area of country along the course of three years of active conflict, through thousands of engagements, and among many thousands of troops. That these occasional cases have characterized our Army or its conduct is not true, any more than the deeds of lawless violence which constantly occur in every large city characterize the people of the city. The war in the Philippines has been conducted by the American Army with scrupulous regard for the rules of civilized warfare, with careful and genuine consideration for the prisoner and the noncombatant, with self-restraint, and with humanity never surpassed, if ever equaled, in any conflict, worthy only of praise, and reflecting credit upon the American people.

There is more of this that I might read. But I appeal to these men who are lawyers not to convict their own fellow-countrymen without the semblance of a trial. When you read me what some man has said before a Senate committee, will you not please, before convicting 40,000 or 70,000 men of misconduct as soldiers, wait till some of the men who are accused can appear before the same committee?

Why, sir, under the light of the American system of Government a man who in broad daylight assassinated a President was accorded a fair trial in a court of law—not 10,000 miles away but about 600 away from here.

I beseech gentlemen here to discard from their hearts the spirit of partisanship in dealing with questions of this kind. I desire to plead for justice to our own fellow-citizens. I desire to appeal to gentlemen to stand up for their own fellow-countrymen. I plead that until the last particle of evidence is given in the jury shall not pronounce its seal of doom. Gentlemen, I appeal to you to stand with us above all for our own "boys in blue" who are carrying your work, your mission of light and civilization in the twentieth century—the mission of the United States of America, the United States of the world. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] has seen fit to inject into this debate the character of speech that he has indulged in. I think the gentleman has forgotten, or at least has refused to recognize many things when he indulges in this character of discussion. I think he has forgotten that the complaints, the assaults, that he has been in the habit of making for thirty-five years following the war of the rebellion, are not now in place.

I can see how a man, situated as he has been during this period, might indulge in criticisms of the Government, in criticisms of the Army, in assaults in fact upon everything that has been done. But the era making justifiable, perhaps, that kind of plaint and that kind of discussion, we are told has passed. The gentleman apparently thinks that now, while the war in the Philippines is going on, it is proper for him to use the same methods, the same character of assault, to look upon the Government as he did and has through all of the intervening years, when he talked about "your Government," talked about "your Army," talked about what "you did." I had supposed that the gentleman was now prepared to talk about "our Government," to talk about "our Army," to talk about what "we did," and what "our duties" are. But it seems he can not forget the old days and the old methods.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman permit a correction there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. VANDIVER. Instead of saying "your Government," I did say "our Government;" and I said what "we are doing." The gentleman's statement is not correct in that particular.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman may have changed his pronouns, but he has not changed his method. [Laughter.] It is the same old method. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman forgets another thing, that this army that he is criticising is our Army, that the boys who compose that army are our boys, that they were raised in American homes; that they have been taught American civiliz-tion, and he ought not to join with all of the libelers and slanderers to traduce his own. Every man knows that in a state of war, where large armies are assembled, there will be some characters who are not, perhaps, all that they should be. There may be some men—a few—who would be cruel men at home or abroad, who would indulge in outrages upon the American continent or in the islands; but, forgetting that, it seems to me that he has seized upon every exaggerated story that bears harmfully upon his own, upon our Army, upon our boys, and for what purpose? To secure, as he hopes, a miserable and despicable political advantage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I feel ashamed of the man, whoever he may be, who loses his Americanism in the pursuit of a petty imaginary political advantage, and I want to tell the gentleman he is mistaken in his expectation that that advantage will come. No matter how he may look upon the Army as alien, no matter how he may look upon his Government as foreign, he will have but few sympathizers among the American people. His old methods, his castaway methods, will not be potential in this day of enlightenment, bearing upon the questions that now are before the American people. I do not see how it is possible for any American to take delight in parading before the world all these miserable exaggerations of fact when the only result can be to degrade Americanism, to degrade the standards of estimation in which this nation is or ought to be held. What good does it do that he should parade all these matters? He knows that if there has been violation of discipline, if there has been a violation of the laws of war, if there has been extraordinary cruelty, that the men, the individuals, the exceptionals will be punished, as they should be. No man wants to screen crime of that kind. He can not secure a party advantage in that way. If these things are true, they are horrors to Republicans as well as to Democrats.

Mr. VANDIVER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, I think so.

Mr. VANDIVER. I have not introduced politics into this matter, nor do I hope for political advantage, but now I want to ask, in view of what the gentleman has said, that Republicans abhor these crimes as much as we do—why is it, then, that Republicans, the gentleman himself among them, have been here in session now for nearly six months, and have never yet decried these horrors, but have allowed them to go on, and, I will venture to say, have not spoken a word against them. Now, let me read one sentence from the official report, the report of the Inspector-General, to show these are not exaggerations. May I read that?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I presumed the gentleman made his speech. He had an hour, and his heart seemed to be full of all the influences of malice and malevolence to bring all the facts to bear. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not care to yield my time.

Mr. VANDIVER. The gentleman seems anxious to conceal them all.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, will you protect me from that gentleman? [Loud laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I can tell the gentleman why we have not discussed this matter. It is because we do not believe these statements.

Mr. VANDIVER. That is just why I want the gentleman to let me read the official evidence, the official reports, to prove them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman did not make his case in an hour, I do not know why I should yield to him now.

Mr. VANDIVER. No; you do not want any more facts.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not want any more of such facts dribbled through you. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, we do not believe these statements to be true. If they are true——

Mr. VANDIVER. Then, one question. Are you willing to admit the finding of a court-martial to be true?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, will you keep that gentleman in his seat? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me just for one moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Iowa believe that it is true that General Smith issued an order to make Samar a howling wilderness, and to kill all men and women over 10 years of age? Or does he believe that to be a lie?

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe that to be a lie. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not believe that General Smith ever issued an order of that kind. I do not believe that any other American officer ever made an order of that kind. I believe it to be a slander, pure and simple.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman believe that the lawyer representing the defendant in the court-martial in the Philippines the other day, who acknowledged that that order had been issued, was lying when he acknowledged it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know anything about the conditions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman believe——

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know who the lawyer was, but I have known some lawyers who were capable of a lie. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did the gentleman ever know a lawyer to lie by admission or confession against his client?

Mr. HEPBURN. There are some lawyers who are not smart.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One other question. Does the gentleman believe that the officer who was being tried, and who pleaded General Smith's order in his justification, was making a lying plea?

Mr. VANDIVER. And who was acquitted by the court-martial on that ground?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, that gentleman has again broken loose. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield further. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know upon what kind of flimsy pretext the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from Mississippi will hang a belief, but I do know something about the American people. I do know something about American officers. I do know something about the civilization in which they have been reared. I do know something about the laws of war that govern and control them and that they are familiar with. I know something about the laws of humanity that animate them in common with the rest of us, and therefore I am prepared to say, in my judgment, that any statement of an order of that kind, of its existence as having been issued, is false, and made for a sinister purpose.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I just want to make a suggestion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am always glad to hear suggestions from the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it not true that the fact of the promulgation of this order was made public in the course of a court-martial of Major Waller by United States officers?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not in that way.

Mr. COCHRAN. And is it not true that the counsel representing the defendant pleaded that order in justification?

Mr. HEPBURN. But, Mr. Chairman, suppose it is true?

Mr. COCHRAN. Then that is what we want to hear you about.

Mr. HEPBURN. But admitting that it be true, for the sake of argument. These men are now undergoing a court-martial. The investigation is being made, and what good is it to parade these matters before the whole civilized world? Where do you find consolation in the fact, if it is true, that they are to be punished, if it is true that the processes of justice have been set to work against them? Why parade it here? What is the benefit that will come from it?

Mr. COCHRAN. But the officer who was just tried was not punished, but acquitted on the ground of his superior officer having ordered him to do it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not that officer now being tried?

Mr. COCHRAN. The verdict has not reached us yet.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not General Smith now undergoing trial?

Mr. COCHRAN. I am only trying to enlighten the gentleman as to the fact that these things are true.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; you do not establish the fact that they are true in the way that you suggest; not at all. Some man may have used in his defense this fiction of an order——

Mr. COCHRAN. Then do you think that the acquittal of Major Waller was secured by pleading a falsehood?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, that is not a fair question at all, and I do not propose to answer it. I am content to make the statement that in my belief no such order as is charged against General Smith was ever issued. I am content to rest there.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that, whether such an order as has been referred to was issued or not, there has been no claim by anyone that Samar was made a howling wilderness, or that any man or any child was injured in Samar by reason of that order, if there was such an order?

Mr. HEPBURN. I take it for granted that Samar is not a howling wilderness, or the gentleman from Missouri. with glee, would have told us of that fact. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague upon the committee forty-five minutes.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes of that forty-five minutes to my colleague on the committee, Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, judges full often become advocates, unfortunately; and the bitter language of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] illustrates the truth of this statement most forcibly. However, I can not, or rather I will not, permit the opportunity to pass without noticing at least a portion of what the gentleman from Iowa has said. I deprecate in no uncertain terms the effort of any American citizen to make political capital out of the unfortunate occurrences in the Philippine Islands. It is a matter that lies beyond the partisan, whether Republican or Democrat. Whether true or false, when we discuss them, as we should, nay, as is our bounden duty, we should speak not in the hope of political advantage for this or that side of the Chamber.

I can not refrain from expressing astonishment at the vindictive and bitter exposition made by the gentleman from Connecticut of the barbarous and inhuman practices of some of the semicivilized inhabitants of those unhappy islands. He hurled it with ghoulish glee in the teeth of gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber as a justification for what is charged against the American Army in those islands. I condemn with equal sternness and severity the barbarities, if barbarities there be, of the Filipino and the American soldier. It is not to criticise the Army—but that is a right that every decent, fair, and intelligent man not only claims, but possesses. When did the Army become so sacred that when it does wrong an American citizen can not criticise it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. To defend the Army is to investigate error.

Mr. WHEELER. Are we to sit quietly by when unworthy men wearing the uniform of their country do unworthy deeds and not expose them?

The gentleman from Iowa asks pathetically what good will come from an exposition of the barbarities that have been committed by these vicious, unworthy men that have been exposed upon the floor of this House. Sir, what good comes to civilization when the prowling night thief, who climbs your porches and commits depredations on your property, is exposed and condemned? What good comes to human civilization when the murderer and the thief and all of those infamous men that connect their names with crimes are brought to the bar of judgment, and for their act branded with infamy, and henceforth known as scoundrels and unworthy to associate with decent people or with the better class of their kind? I in the same manner condemn all human monsters who in the security of their rank set social safety and civilization at defiance, not as a Democrat, not as a Republican, but as an American citizen; not in condemnation of the Army, not in condemnation of our civilization, but as an humble citizen who loves justice and is not so charged with bitter partisanship that he is lost to all sense of pity.

I condemn in unmeasured terms the barbarities said to be practiced in those unhappy islands by men who wear the uniform of our country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Our country, my country, and I say my because under the providence of God I will be here when you are gone. How foolish, how unworthy of the great gentleman from Iowa to quibble and seek to dodge behind the facts that there is no official statement as to the guilt of this inhuman monster Smith. Not as a Republican, but as President of the United States—and I pause here to give him my unstinted commendation for his manly efforts to bring justice, not as a Republican, but as the chief citizen of the Republic, to this same inhuman monster that you say it is unpatriotic to criticise and condemn. [Loud applause.] Is he acting without authority? Would he disgrace his great place or subject himself to the criticism of the delicate consciences possessed by the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Iowa by ordering a court-martial to investigate this man upon testimony so flimsy that it is unbecoming for us to mention it upon the floor of Congress?

This is not a political question. This is not a criticism of the Army, but it is a criticism of that policy which we have warned you against, that gives the opportunity to produce the occasion for these unspeakable acts. We point them out to you to show you where you are drifting. Inhumanity and barbarity in the Philippines will, as certain as God hung the sun in yonder heavens, culminate in inhumanity and barbarity in your own homes and the Republic. It is against the system; it is against the opportunity; it is against the occasion; it is against the men that make these opportunities and make the occasion, that we as American citizens are protesting in earnest terms, not as partisans, but as patriots.

I agree with you, sir, that it is unfortunate that we should be required to air these things before the world; but, sir, it serves to illustrate a lesson that all can well afford to learn. I remember to have read with shuddering horror when the man Kitchener, now commanding in South Africa, was sent along the Nile, he reached Omdurman, and when these helpless people came in white robes and kneeled with uplifted hands to pray for peace at his hands, a long file of women and children knelt on that sunlit plain amidst those adobe houses, his answer to them was to open upon them with grape and canister and shoot down thousands of women and children in order to set an example to the unfortunate Egyptians and establish peace and to accomplish benevolent assimilation. And yet on the floor of the British Parliament men rose in their places and defended that act.

Never did I dream that on the floor of the American Congress there could be found even a man from Connecticut or from Iowa who would be willing to arise in his place and speak in terms of commendation of an order issued by an American general under the American flag in the American uniform to kill all above the age of 10, whether they be women or men.

And yet we find that men are so eager for partisan advantage they stifle their noble impulses—I say noble impulses because these gentlemen who speak in commendation of these crimes are gentlemen of chivalrous and noble impulses, patriotic and country loving; but it only shows, gentlemen, to what depths of degradation we may descend for partisan advantage. Is honor so dear, or national good will so sweet that we must put beneath us every emotion of charity and humanity? Is national glory so much to be sought in our war with the Philippines that the American flag, thus far unstained by barbarities, shall sacrifice thousands and thousands of lives, forgetting the traditions and teachings of our country? [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I heartily appreciate and approve of the eloquent words of my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] who has just taken his seat, and I want also to assure the members of this House that with me there is something dearer than party advantage. I am not ashamed of the fact that I am a Democrat, but above that I am an American citizen, and above that I am a human being. [Laughter on the Republican side.] It seems evident from the snarling and sneers of some gentlemen on the other side that they have lost the sentiments of humanity, if they ever had any.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that my sole purpose in presenting these facts to the House of Representatives was to bring them to your attention, because I do not believe that you have investigated them; I do not believe you have taken the pains to examine the evidence of these charges. I challenge you now to investigate them, and if I can not substantiate every fact I have mentioned on this floor here to-day, I shall withdraw every one of them.

Now, it seems to be the policy of the managers on the other side of the floor and of the party in power to protect itself by insinuating that every criticism that is offered, every statement of fact as to barbarity and cruelty of our soldiers in the Philippines, is a reflection on the glory of the American Army. The Washington Post, usually an Administration organ, has this editorial comment on the course you are pursuing:

A QUESTION OF NATIONAL HONOR.

Those Republicans in Congress who have seen fit to condone the alleged atrocities in the Philippines by comparing them with the work of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan during the civil war can hardly be complimented upon their taste or their regard for the truths of history. Even if their proposition had any warrant in fact the argument would be beneath contempt. An act of barbarism committed forty years ago does not excuse inhuman cruelty to-day. As well set up the bloody Duke of Alva as a screen for Hell Roaring Jake Smith to hide behind.

It is not true, however, that the Union armies in the South, or even Quantrell's Confederate guerrillas on the Kansas border, ever practiced such hideous savagery as is charged against certain of our officers in the Philippines. The accusations in question may or may not be well founded—we hope not—but such as they are, true or otherwise, they far exceed in horror anything ever dreamed of in the war of 1861-1865 between the North and South. Every survivor of that tremendous conflict knows that we speak the truth herein. It was a war—a desperate and sanguinary war, a struggle of the Titans—and death and desolation were its fruits. But it was not a ruthless and barbaric orgie, a carnival of ghouls and fiends. To say it is to slander the living and the dead of both sides—the bravest men that ever fought.

Just why Congress can not investigate this affair in a judicial and patriotic spirit we can not even distantly imagine. It is not properly a party matter. There is no anti-American party in this country—none that should be willing to seek or to accept advantage at the cost of our national dignity and honor. Such a party would deserve the scorn and execration of all honest men. What we seek is the truth. We want to know, for the sake of our flag and our humanity, whether these appalling crimes have been committed, and if so, at whose instance and responsibility. To make this quest the opportunity for political campaign material is simple, unadulterated shame.

Republicans and Democrats should make common cause in the effort to erase a frightful scandal and to punish the guilty, if such there be. Party rivalries may wait upon our common honor.

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] stated emphatically that he did not believe these stories and charges, I asked him if he would allow me to read him one sentence from an official document coming from an official of the Army who had himself investigated them, and he declined to hear it read. I will now read just two sentences from the report of Maj. Frank B. McKenna, Inspector-General of the United States Army, who investigated, by the authority of the War Department, the charges of cruelty against the helpless natives in northern Luzon. Here is what he says:

Saturina de la Cruz, age 18; married; lives in barrio San Rafael, Montalban: Night of February 21, after taps, about 10 o'clock, three Macabebe soldiers armed with guns and one with revolver entered her house; she and her husband were asleep; a man with a revolver forced her husband out of the house; other two took him away first, then returned and at the point of a revolver raped her; she was raped again on night of the 25th.

I should not mention such a deplorable and outrageous instance, if it had been the only one committed or if it had been a very exceptional case. But here in this report this officer details case after case just as barbarous as that; and in conclusion he makes this general, sweeping statement about the whole affair:

In conclusion, I find, if the almost unanimous testimony of the natives is to be considered, that the Macabebe garrison at Montalban has committed numerous outrages against them; that these acts of violence commenced almost with the arrival of the Macabebes, and occurred at intervals until the night of February 25, when on that night they must have indulged themselves in a saturnalia, almost, of rapine and violence under the guise of looking for insurgents.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEWART of New York having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his Secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution (H. J. Res. 177) providing for the printing of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOSS. I have the consent of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] to yield of the time which I have left five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, war is a barbarism whenever and wherever engaged in by mankind. It is a constant struggle between two opposing forces to protect and preserve the lives of the one and to destroy the lives of the other. Under what is called civilized warfare—if there is such a thing—it is allowable to the commander of a force to adopt a course that might otherwise be denominated cruel barbarism and atrocity, in order to prevent or to put a stop to still greater cruelties and atrocities. And in extreme cases in warfare the black flag is justified.

Such are the universal rules of warfare. While many gentlemen on the other side seem to delight in referring to every report that comes to them of cruelties and barbarities charged upon American soldiers, they fail to recall the history of our own war in this generation. On our own soil and under the flag of Christian civilization, as we call it, the Shenandoah Valley was swept with fire by order of the Commanding General of the Army. Every gristmill and every storehouse was destroyed. The naked chimneys of dwellings destroyed in that conflict lined that fertile valley from the Potomac to the mountains. Sherman's "march to the sea" left in its rear the smoke of burning dwellings darkening the sky. And part of Atlanta was laid in ashes.

Mr. COCHRAN rose.

Mr. GROW. I can not yield to anybody.

I am calling attention to the scenes of our own civil war, on both sides—Chambersburg, burned by the Confederate soldiers, the houses of women and children burned over their heads; of Atlanta, part of which was burned by the Union Army, and the desolation of Sherman's "march to the sea."

Why should you not rake up from dead history all the cruelties perpetrated then under what we called "civilized warfare?" But who ever thought or who would now think of arraigning American citizen, soldiers on either side, when that contest was over for anything that had been done in the course of it?

American citizen soldiers do not become barbarians as soon as they leave the shores of their native land any more than they are at home. [Applause.] This arraignment, this delight in bringing up everything pertaining to war, barbarous and atrocious as it is in all cases, does not become the members of the American Congress to-day. Why should gentlemen undertake to libel and malign the glorious achievements of the citizen soldiers of the American Army from the time the war with Spain was declared? The insurrection in the Philippine Islands against the authority of the Government of the United States was the result of two things.

One was the return of Aguinaldo to the Philippine Islands. When the war was declared he was at Singapore on his way to France or England, having left the islands with a pledge to the authorities of the Spanish Government never to return. The other was the discussion in the Senate of the United States of the treaty of peace on a resolution in open session. These two things caused the insurrection in the islands, and from that day to this there has been a class of wordy politicians calling themselves anti-imperialists perverting the actual facts of history in order, if possible, to bring discredit upon their own Government and the citizen soldiers of the Republic.

The first perversion of the facts of history in order to bring discredit upon the Government is that Dewey brought Aguinaldo with him to Manila. Aguinaldo reached Manila nineteen days after Dewey had destroyed the Asiatic squadron of the Spanish navy, and Dewey reported to his home Government that at that time there was no insurrection in the islands worth speaking of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROW. Just one word more, if the House will pardon me. All I wish to say in conclusion is that the cruelties of war are always to be deprecated. One man can not claim in his self-conceit that he is superior to all others in his sentiment of humanity. Everybody has but one sentiment and one feeling as to these barbarities, but it is an incident of war. The order issued by General Smith was after the massacre of a portion of the Ninth Regiment, by treachery, and a massacre of unarmed men. It was the regiment that scaled San Juan Hill.

If a general was ever justified in issuing an order to kill every man with arms in his hands—and the order did not apply to children, as has been so often repeated on this floor; it was only those who bore arms, and 10-year-old soldiers in the Philippine army have killed American soldiers—the general was justified in issuing that order if that was the most probable method to end such atrocities. He did just what Lincoln's order 100 was here at home in our own war, and if there was no way to put an end to these barbarities in Samar, he was justified under the rules of what is called civilized warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks that I shall submit upon this bill I do not propose to make a merely technical speech or one of detail, or even to discuss generally the history and value of our Navy to us in the past, or of an adequate navy to any State aspiring to a place among the nations. As a member of the Naval Committee, I have more than once presented this branch of the subject. There is hardly any occasion for it now. Public opinion, which was once much divided, is now practically unanimous for a navy which shall be effective for our wants and needs as a leading power of the globe, with large and extensive interests to defend. The increase and maintenance of the Navy is not a sectional question. The West is as much interested as the Atlantic seaboard.

The great Mississippi Valley can not permit the mouth of the Mississippi River, its natural outlet for commerce, to be blocked by a hostile fleet any more than by those natural obstructions to commerce which science is now removing. The Pacific coast is keenly alive to the protection of its cities and the development of its trade to Australia, South America, and the Orient. Nor is the question in any sense a party question. Since 1883 both the political parties have been friendly to this policy, and all the Secretaries of each party have urged a liberal expenditure. I have a right to point to the energetic efforts, zeal, and intelligence of Secretary Whitney and Secretary Herbert in this grand work.

The Democratic party has been in all its history jealous of a large standing army, knowing that in other lands it had been often used by bad rulers to deprive the people of their rights and to commit them to bloody, expensive, and ruinous wars; but it has had no such dread of the Navy. With our party the Navy has always been the favorite arm of national defense, and it will continue to be so. Fortunately, in this country we do not need a large standing army. We have a large arms-bearing population, easily converted into good soldiers, and we have a large volunteer soldiery. We have more than one excellent military school besides West Point for the training of our officers. We have no powerful or dangerous neighbor to guard against. We have peaceful relations with Great Britain, and I hope and believe they will continue to be friendly; but if it were unfortunately otherwise, no invasion from Canada is even a possible peril.

The army of 200,000 men which England has with so much difficulty and expense sent to South Africa to put down and conquer the Boers could not protect Canada against us if we were forced to invade that country. Mexico is sincerely friendly to this country, and the bonds of amity and commercial intercourse are drawing closer every day. I see no occasion whatever, therefore, for a large standing army for our defense. It can only be necessary in the event that this country is to be committed to a policy of foreign conquest—colonies, land grabbing, and spoliation. To such a policy the traditions of our fathers, the lessons of the Constitution, and our own practical interests are all opposed, and though such a policy may have been temporarily fastened upon us by the party in power, I do not believe it can stand or ought to stand. I do not defend or advocate a navy as a part of such a programme of subject colonies, war, and imperialism, and if there was no other and nobler argument for building up our Navy, I should hesitate to vote for it. I desire to see peace, and

PEACE WITH HONOR.

I can not forget, sir, that we have a population of over 76,000,000. It is rapidly increasing. Our lands are fertile and we have every variety of production. There is probably no large area of territory in the world capable of sustaining so large a population as ours with general comfort and happiness as ours. With this vast area of soil, and every year developing some new method of human sustenance and advancement, no man can fix a limit upon our growth. In agriculture we are easily the first of the nations. Our manufactures are already being shipped to every part of the world; but this grand movement which has so seriously alarmed the industrial centers of Europe has barely begun. Our commercial marine, I admit, is not what it should be nor what it will be at no distant day. Other nations have grown in wealth and population, but we have outgrown them all in wealth. In population we are second, indeed, to Russia, but we are immeasurably superior to that country in wealth and resources. China has a vast population, but the great mass are paupers. She is notoriously deficient in the arts of war and peace; has no capital, and can not now be regarded as a rival to any country. Neither her army nor her navy deserve any consideration.

With a rapidly growing nation and a developing commerce with all the world, we

as far as it is possible to have it, and we need also the ability to protect our commerce and our markets. How can we do this or even attempt to do it without a strong and efficient Navy? [Applause.]

This is not all. Let us remember, sir, that we have a line of seacoast on the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific to defend which can not be less than six or eight thousand miles; it is far greater than that of any European nation. In addition to this we have Alaska to defend, both by sea and by land. Alaska does not represent the new-fledged policy of greed and foreign conquest. We bought her from Russia many years ago, and she proves to have great resources. Then there is Hawaii, which we secured by agencies which some regard as more questionable, but it is an important outpost on the Pacific, and that people have certainly been greatly blessed by our rule. No native of Hawaii has been killed or maltreated in order to exploit our civilization or our trade. I did not favor its annexation, but I do favor its defense, if necessary.

CUBAN POLICY.

I come now to a yet more vital point. I mean Cuba and the West Indies. I think it would be very unwise to annex Cuba, either as a State or a Territory, even if she came to us voluntarily. We have had trouble enough already with incongruous elements of population. Let Cuba carve out her own destinies in peace. She has a wonderfully fertile soil, and the proof is that in two years she recovered from the ravages of a long and desolating war and all her people are now employed. No laborer stands in need of work. But we have dislodged Spanish power. We have made Cuba free and independent, and we can not and will not permit any European government to establish dominion there. In order to make good our position there and properly guard our interests in respect to Cuba we must maintain and develop our naval strength. The same is true in respect to Porto Rico and also the Danish West Indies, if the latter pass into our hands.

I think the truth of these observations can not be denied by any intelligent man; but there is another and a fixed policy of the United States handed down to us by our ancestors to which we have to look. I refer to the well-known Monroe doctrine. I do not need to recite its history to this House. The country is familiar with it since the time it was formally announced by President Monroe in the early days of the last century. It was in substance, as embodied in his message of 1823, that while we did not propose to disturb the possessions then held by the powers of Europe in North and South America, we would regard as an unfriendly and hostile act the attempt by any one or more of them to extend their dominions in this part of the globe. The republics of South America were especially in the views of this announcement, for it was these countries that were supposed to be menaced by the Holy Alliance. But Cuba, the West Indies, and Mexico were objects of even greater concern to us—Cuba especially.

There has never been a day that our people would have permitted Cuba to be held by any other power of Europe than Spain. Since that memorable declaration of President Monroe we have witnessed the unscrupulous partition of the vast continent of Africa by the powers of Europe and the occupation of large parts of Asia by this or that European power. Two of them occupy each an area there equal to our own on this continent. We have not protested or opposed these proceedings, though public opinion condemned them.

NO PARTITION OF CHINA.

When it came to the proposed partition of China very recently, we threw our influence against it, but I fear the scheme was arrested far more by the jealousies of the great powers than by our interposition. It is suspended for the present, and, I fear, for the present only. It is still a menace to China and our own interests. Germany was the last of the great European powers to adopt this policy of foreign colonies and conquest.

It was not until after the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 that, under the master leadership of Bismarck, Germany became a nation and a great empire. It was natural and right that she should become a nation and a great power. The world looks with admiration on her splendid achievements in war, learning, science, arts, and progress. Under the present Emperor, a man of remarkable force of character, the German Empire has adopted a colonial policy in South Africa and Asia. As an incident and aid to this policy it has created a great navy, which twenty years ago had no existence. Of this navy I may speak hereafter.

But this is not all. This great, powerful, and I may say aggressive people are expanding and colonizing everywhere. They have gone to South America. Hundreds of thousands of Germans are in Brazil settled in its most temperate and inviting regions, and many others are located in Venezuela. That these settlers will rapidly increase and multiply is almost certain, and it is almost equally certain that they will assert themselves and overthrow the existing authorities. They will have for this act plausible reasons and the support of the mother Government, and they will naturally affiliate with the German Empire. This will practically involve an annulment and abrogation of the Monroe doctrine, as our people understand it, and it will involve a very grave issue for our country. This is not all. It means the partition of South America by the great European powers, just as Africa has been divided. The man who can not foresee all this is blind or inattentive to passing events. When that day comes it will be necessary for us to have a if we think our interests shall require us to do so.

I hope this evil day may not come, but if it should, that man will be purblind—I will not say idiotic—who now imagines that the hospitalities we extended the other day to Prince Henry or any courtesies shown to President Roosevelt or any civilities to our ambassador at Berlin by the German Emperor will weigh a feather in settling the disputes that may arise. Pretty speeches and nice dinners are all a part of the diplomacy of European rulers to mask their most serious and dangerous designs.

For a long time European governments, being occupied with enormous land-grabbing in Asia and Africa, paid little heed to our cherished Monroe doctrine, but latterly there are abundant manifestations of opinion all over Europe which indicate an inclination and a purpose to disregard it whenever they please to do so. They will not do it, I am confident, in the West Indies, nor in our neighbor, the Mexican Republic. There they would have to face the power of this country. In respect to South America they feel very differently. Then ask pertinently enough, "If you insist on playing the dog in the manger in South America, why are you building up a conquest in the Philippines over an unwilling people of ten millions?" Sir, we have beyond a doubt weakened the logic of our position and lessened the hold we might have had if we had adhered to our old traditions as a government and a people.

STRONG NAVY INDISPENSABLE.

I have said enough to show that without adopting a policy of imperialism, colonies, and conquest, a strong navy for us is indispensable to guard our varied interests and maintain our just rights all over the world. We have interests everywhere to defend and protect. This is better than the sectional malignity and persecution urged by certain politicians of the dominant party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In this cursory and imperfect review I have said nothing of the proposed isthmian canal. Public sentiment in the United States may not be united in respect to the selection of a route, but it is overwhelmingly in favor of beginning at an early day the construction of such a canal by the American Government, to be paid for out of our own Treasury, to be under American sovereignty, and to be operated, managed, and guarded by us. Other nations are to share in its benefits, but it is to be an American canal just as the Suez Canal is substantially and effectively a British canal.

But how can we guard and

PROTECT OUR CANAL

if it is to be at the mercy of any one of three or four European powers which may happen to have a superior navy? We have, indeed, a treaty with Great Britain, which gives a reasonable assurance in that quarter, but we have none bearing on this question with Germany, France, Russia, or Italy, to say nothing of Japan, Austria, and the South American powers. Yet it is proposed to expend $200,000,000 on this canal, which could be destroyed in forty-eight hours by any country having a superior fleet to our own. I favor the canal, but I favor also a Navy capable of defending it.

WAR IS A CALAMITY

under any circumstances, however just and necessary. The late Spanish war carried evils in its train which many are beginning to believe will far outweigh any possible benefits. Of these I do not now care to speak, but there is one mischievous result to which I may advert as directly appropriate to the pending question. We engaged a power which did not have a third of our population or a tenth part of our wealth and resources, with an army brave enough but badly fed, badly equipped, badly officered, and who were fighting over 3,000 miles away from their own soil. That army was bound to be overcome in the end, unless Spain could maintain her command of the sea and supply it from time to time with reenforcements of men, food, arms, munitions, and all that is necessary to equip and keep up an army in war. Hence, in order to keep her hold on Cuba, Spain was compelled to send her fleet to the West Indies and put up the best fight she could. We did not have a large navy, but it was almost perfect in its way.

It was immensely superior to that of Spain. Spain has not been a strong naval power for centuries. In the early days her galleons were the easy prey of the English buccaneers and daring adventurers. The "invincible Spanish armada," prepared with so much ostentation and expense to overwhelm England in the days of Queen Elizabeth, was easily baffled, defeated, and destroyed by one-third or one-half their number of British vessels manned by men of our own stock and race. From that day to this Spain has not figured as a naval power. I do not mean to reflect upon Spanish valor or character, but as a nation she has not exhibited naval aptitude like that of the northern nations of Europe. So when the Spanish war came on, Spain had a navy, it is true, but a navy on paper; brave and splendid heroes like Cervera and his associate captains, but it was no match for our few efficient and well-handled ships.

The battles of Manila Bay and Santiago were very easy victories. If you doubt this statement, look at the lists of the killed and wounded on each side, a few only on our side and thousands on the other. Compare these suggestive figures with the naval battles of the war of 1812, such as the Constitution and Guerriere, the Chesapeake and the Shannon, and all the others of our history, including that battle which is painted on our walls, when Perry had to quit his sinking ship to fight in another, or when John Paul Jones, by sheer endeavor and with his decks running with blood, upheld the glory of our arms till the enemy struck his flag. It is needless to refer to the bloody battles of the Nile, the Baltic, or Trafalgar, in the days when a ship would lose half her crew and still fight on till victory crowned endurance and valor and suffering.

FOLLY HAS GONE WILD.

Over this easy victory against Spain folly has gone wild, and many interpret it as a proof that we are already a great naval power and that the world is half afraid of us. For one I do not believe it. This battle was not fought with a great maritime power, but with a very weak one, and we have no right to assume that a British, French, or a German ship is like a Spanish ship, and not equal to our own. The ships of Great Britain, Germany, and France have all the aids of modern naval science; they have officers of trained skill, high courage, with good crews, and if ever we should have to meet one of them it will be a very different combat from that at Santiago or Manila. Our officers and men will do all that we have a right to ask, but it will be no holiday task.

CONSIDER OUR NAVAL STRENGTH.

Therefore, I say it is important for us to consider, first, what is our naval strength to-day, and also that of the leading European powers. I say to-day, secondly, it is well to ask what are they doing in the way of an increase, and what are we doing?

It would be trifling with a great question and with this House to speak on this point with a lack of candor. I shall not do so. The building of a Navy or even of a single vessel of war is not a thing that can be hidden from the world. The effective strength of the navies of the great powers is a matter of publicity and notoriety. We know the present strength of England, Russia, France, and Germany. All these powers, save Russia, have to go before the legislative bodies to procure the means and authority to increase their armaments, just as our own Executive comes to Congress for the necessary supplies and authority. I venture the assertion that there is not a government in Europe that does not know exactly our strength and our weakness, how many fighting battle ships we have, how many we are building, and how long we will have to wait for their completion. Let us, therefore, look the truth fairly in the face. It will not do to "live in a fool's paradise."

NAVAL PROGRAMME.

The able report submitted by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] in the paragraph on the cost of ships of the new Navy gives the number of completed battle ships as 10, and those building as 8; armored cruisers built, 2, and building, 6; protected cruisers built, 12, and building, 9. The report well says that—

> While we have built and are building all told 138 ships, yet comparatively few of them have any real fighting value. Our naval power lies almost entirely in our 18 battle ships, 8 armored cruisers, and 21 protected cruisers. The rest of our ships would cut but little figure in actual war. Ships of the battle line practically alone determine the naval strength of a nation.

But, sir, when you examine this table in the report it appears that only 24 battle ships of the three descriptions mentioned are already built and available for service. Some twenty-three ships are being built or authorized, and we know by sad experience how long it takes us after a ship is authorized by law to have her built, armored, and equipped, so as to be ready for commission. According to this report, on May 4, 1898—some four years ago—there were authorized three battle ships, each of 12,500 tons—the Maine, Missouri, and the Ohio. Four years have elapsed. These ships are being built at three different private yards.

The Maine is completed 87 per cent, the Missouri 60 per cent, and the Ohio 56 per cent. After that will come the armor, often a slow business, and it may be two years more before these three battle ships will be added to our effective force. Over three years ago three more battle ships were authorized, of about 15,000 tons each, namely, the Virginia, Nebraska, and Georgia. They are also to be built at different private yards. Eight per cent of work has been done on the Georgia and nothing on the Virginia and the Nebraska. Three years ago there were authorized three armored cruisers of 14,000 tons each. The highest percentage of work done on any one of the three is 19 per cent. This is a bad exhibit.

The Secretary of the Navy tells us that the contracts for the construction of the six armored cruisers authorized by the acts of March 3, 1899, and June 7, 1900, require their completion in three years from the date of the contract. The five battle ships authorized by the same laws are also to be completed in three years from the date of the contract. After that will come the armor and armament, often a slow business. From all this and from past experience it will be three years or more before we can count on having the ships already authorized ready for service.

Let us look briefly at the strength of the other great powers and see what they are doing to increase it. England has about 50 battle ships. She is building energetically. Her known and avowed policy it is to make and keep her navy fully equal to any possible combination against her by any two of the European powers. She dare not do less. She can not afford to be driven from the sea. Her programme for this and the next year includes 5 more battle ships. She has 18 armored cruisers and will speedily add 8 more to the number. Remember that she builds and equips a ship in about one-half the time that we do. She has many other ships already built, such as torpedo boats and destroyers, but she is adding heavily to this force. She has 29 coast-defense ships and monitors. Her government dockyards are in the highest state of equipment and efficiency, not merely to repair ships, but to build them.

France has 18 large battle ships and will build 6 more in two years. She has 21 armored cruisers and is about to build 3 more. She has 14 coast-defense ships and monitors. She has 253 torpedo boats to our 35. She is far inferior to this country in wealth, population, and resources.

Russia has a navy larger than our own and is adding to it energetically. And yet she has no Atlantic port, no easy access to that ocean, and no great commerce to protect. She has only one or two ports on the Pacific. Her great strength lies in her vast territory and her comparative inaccessibility to invasion. She needs a navy far less than we do, but she is a great power and her Government is wise, sagacious, and farseeing. She means to have a navy worthy of her high place and aspirations among the nations.

I come now to that great Empire which we ought to watch most carefully. I refer to Germany. There is no malice on either side, but there may be a conflict of interests and ambitions, especially if we adhere to the Monroe doctrine, as we will, and yet more danger if we persevere in the folly of subject colonies and imperialism. Now, what is the strength and what the plans of Germany? Remember that only three or four years ago we were fourth among the nations in naval strength. Now,

GERMANY IS THE FOURTH AND WE ARE THE FIFTH.

I beg here to remind you that we have a far larger population than Germany and much more wealth and capital. We are richer than Germany, Russia, France, or even Great Britain. But Germany has an able ruler, and her people are industrious, ambitious, energetic. They are a strong and aggressive nation. The German army is easily the first in Europe in case of war. Her people in war would be patriotic and united. About twenty years ago the German navy was only nominal, but with the rapid growth of her commerce and the adoption of the policy of having foreign colonies her statesmen have concluded that it was indispensable to have a strong navy. She is building more rapidly than any other country. Already Germany has 25 battle ships, 9 armored cruisers, and many other ships. The committee report sums up the situation briefly but clearly:

Her ship-building programme started in 1898 and will be completed in 1908, possibly in 1907. It will give her in all 38 battle ships, 14 large cruisers, 38 smaller cruisers, and 98 torpedo boats. After the completion of this programme, the plan contemplates new constructions to replace ships which, though still serviceable, may have reached the prescribed age limit.

I say nothing of such powers as Italy, Austria, Chile, and Japan, countries with far less wealth than our own, and not having our large and varied interests to defend all over the world. Nor will I speak of a possible combination against us by powers singly inferior, but united superior, to our own force.

Being deeply impressed with the gravity of this branch of the subject, and anxious to obtain all possible light, both for my own benefit and for that of others who might listen to my suggestions or read them, I applied directly to the proper officers of the Navy Department, and through the courtesy of Captain Sigsbee, the Chief Intelligence Officer of our Navy, I have been supplied in accordance with my specific request with some very valuable tables which more than confirm and vindicate the observations I have made in respect to the status of the great naval powers and our own. They present the subject far more clearly and fully than anything I could say. I ask the permission of the House to print them as an addendum to my remarks, and I beg members to weigh well the facts which they contain. These tables contain:

IMPORTANT CONSIDERATION OF CONDITIONS.

First. A comparison of the German and United States ship-building programmes; this includes a list of the United States ships built and building and the German naval-building programme.

Second. A table of United States ships building and the state of completion of each.

Third. A printed list of vessels built and building for the principal navies.

There is another table, being a copy of a memorandum furnished the Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives, as to the relative cost of shipbuilding in navy-yards and by private contract in England, France, and Germany.

All these tables will be found interesting and instructive. They are of the highest official authority.

GOVERNMENT YARD SHIPBUILDING.

In respect to the last point, I beg to say that I have favored the policy of giving our own navy-yards a trial in building ships. There was a time in our history when all or nearly all of our ships of war were built in Government navy-yards. These ships won the splendid naval battles of the war of 1812–14. They were worthy of the brave men who fought on their decks. It has been said, I think by some naval expert, that these victories of 1812–14 were won by the work in our navy-yards.

Now, the practice of England, France, Germany, and Russia is to build largely in the Government dockyards. England builds most of her ships in Government dockyards, and they do not cost any more than those built in private yards. I do not see why we can not do the same to a certain extent at least. At present not one of our navy-yards is in a fit condition to build and equip a great ship of war. This is not a satisfactory condition of affairs. If a British minister were to go into the House of Commons and announce that the Government did not possess a single dockyard where a first-class ship of war could be built immediately he would very probably be hooted out of the House.

Is it a wise thing for this Government so to run its large navy-yards that if war were to break out suddenly, as most wars do, it could not build a single first-class vessel of war in one of them, and in its hour of peril and need would be wholly dependent on the capacity, energy, liberality, and possibly the rapacity of private contractors? They make no provision for possible wars. That would cost money.

If you build a ship in a Government navy-yard, there is not a man connected with its construction, from the captain to the humblest workman, who has any interest in putting off inferior material upon the Government. Every man would be trying to get the best material available for the ship.

An argument sometimes made against building our ships in our own navy-yards is that the yards would be used for political purposes. If this argument be sound, it applies to repairs as well as construction, and we would have to give up the whole business of Government dockyards and admit the Government to be incurably affected with inefficiency and corruption. My observation of naval officers leads me to a far different conclusion than this. I know of no officer who would prostitute a Government navy-yard to dirty political work or attempt to control the votes of the employees. They are far less likely to do it than private contractors.

The building of vessels in our own yards should be tried, not with one ship merely, but fully and fairly, as foreign nations do, from year to year and until we find out what we can do. As we grow we will improve our economics, efficiency, and rapidity of construction. This competition will put the private shipyards to their mettle, quicken and stimulate them to the best work, and enable us to judge when we are paying too much on our contract ships.

It is most important to us to see if something can not be done that will enable us to build ships as rapidly as Great Britain or any other nation. We have unlimited resources. We have steel and iron equal to any in the world. We have the best of timber and of everything else that goes into a ship. We have skillful, highly educated, and scientific officers, not second to those of any country. Our mechanics have a reputation for skill, expertness, individuality, intelligence, and energy superior to those of the Old World, as we all believe. For the life of me I can not see how with all this and our very liberal grants of money by Congress we can not build a ship as quickly as England. Let us equip fully two of our best navy-yards on the Atlantic coast and one on the Pacific coast and see if something can not be done to remedy an evil which in time of war might have the most serious consequences.

In this connection I wish to remind members of the House how often we have read of American contractors for bridges, locomotives, and many forms of structure and work bidding and securing contracts over British bidders by offering better terms not only as to price, but in respect to the time of completion or delivery. This has been done on British soil in different quarters of the globe for years past. The English papers have proclaimed and lamented the fact. This fact is decisive as to what can be done and will be done if we do but resolve to assert ourselves. [Loud applause.]

COMPARISON OF GERMAN AND UNITED STATES WAR-SHIP BUILDING PROGRAMMES.

The German shipbuilding programme will be completed in 1908, probably 1907, instead of 1916, as first planned.

After the completion of the programme the plan contemplates new constructions to replace ships which, though still serviceable, may have reached the prescribed age limit.

The fixed programme contemplated the following new vessels: Four squadrons, each of 8 battle ships; 2 battle ships for flagships; 4 battle ships in reserve.

Besides these, there are to be 14 large cruisers, 38 smaller cruisers, and 16 divisions of torpedo boats of 6 each. Of these 38 battle ships, 31 are built or building; 14 large cruisers, 12 are built or building; 38 smaller cruisers, 33 are built or building. This leaves 7 battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 5 smaller cruisers yet to be appropriated for.

The divisions of torpedo boats are already in advance of the contemplated programme. Two divisions only remain to be authorized.

BUDGET OF 1902.

Battle ships K and L (30 and 31); new ship to replace armored cruiser Kaiser; smaller cruisers K and L; new ship to replace Zieten; 1 gunboat, B (extra to programme); 1 division of torpedo-boat destroyers.

First installment of appropriation for building.—One gunboat for Chinese rivers; to rebuild Brandenburg class of battle ships; fit Marie for gunnery training ship; fit Nixe for cadet school-ship; fit Sophie for apprentice school-ship.

Second installment of appropriation for building.—Battle ships H and J (28 and 29); large armored cruiser, König Wilhelm; three small cruisers, G, H, and J; second and final for division of 6 torpedo-boat destroyers; to rebuild armored const-defense ships of Siegfried class (making them small battle ships.

Third installment of appropriation for building.—Battle ships F and G (26 and 27); armored cruiser, Prinz Adalbert (last installment).

Fourth installment of appropriation for building, final.—Battle ships C, D, and E (23, 24, 25).

SHIPS OF GERMAN NAVY UNDER CONSTRUCTION.

Of the 15 ships now building at Government and private yards, 3 more are to be completed by the end of the present fiscal year, namely: The battle ships Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, armored cruiser Prinz Heinrich, and gunboat Panther. Hence, at the beginning of the next fiscal year there will remain under construction 12 ships; 6 of these are still on the stocks, while on the other 6 the work on the interior is being completed. To these will be added in April the 7 new ships provided for, so that there will be in all 19 ships under construction, namely: Nine battle ships (Wittelsbach, Wettin, Zahringen, Schwaben, Mecklenburg, H, I, K, L); 3 armored cruisers (Prinz Adalbert, Ersatz König Wilhelm, Ersatz Kaiser); 6 small cruisers (G, H, I, K, L, Ersatz Zieten); 1 gunboat (B). (Gunboat B, provided for in the naval budget, is outside of the naval programme.)

Hence, there were under construction 20 large ships, with an aggregate tonnage of 155,830, aside from the two torpedo-boat divisions building at Schichau's and at the Germania Works, of which S. 108 and S. 109 have been launched at Kiel and S. 102 to 107 at Elbing.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY RECORD, JANUARY 23, 1902, OF THE GERMAN NAVY.

During last year four ironclads—the Wetting, the Zahringen, the Schwaben, and the Mecklenburg—were launched for the German navy. The other German launchings in 1901 comprised the large cruiser Prince Adalbert, the Panther (gunboat), and several torpedo-boat destroyers. The Panther was launched at Dantzic and the destroyers at Kiel and Elbing.

As regards further additions now in progress for the German navy, two ironclads—the Kaiser Karl der Grosse and the Wittelsbach—are almost completed, as is also the armor-plated cruiser Prince Heinrich. The coast guard ships—Heimdall, Hildebrand, and Beowulf—are being modified at Kiel and Dantzic and will soon be again ready for service.

Four German ironclads of the Brandenburg type are about to be modified. Their boilers are to be changed, and throughout each ship wood is to be replaced by steel as far as possible; steel tables and other steel furniture are even to be introduced. The ventilation of the four ironclads is to be improved and aerin lance torpedo tubes are to be replaced by submarine tubes.

The introduction of submarine boats into the German navy has been indefinitely postponed.

SUPPLEMENT TO "COMPARATIVE COST OF DOCKYARD-BUILT AND CONTRACT-BUILT SHIPS ABROAD."

[A copy of which was furnished to the chairman of the House committee April 4, 1900.]

The information herein contained has been compiled from the official budgets of England, France, and Germany for 1902. It brings down to date the actual costs of dockyard-built and contract-built ships, or the estimated costs of such ships as modified by the work done during the last two years. The English estimates are usually accurate, but those of France are subject to variation. In Germany the cost has been estimated by taking the sum of partial payments, these generally extending, in the case of battle ships, over a period of four years.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUDENSLAGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 8587.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13895) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. BATE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5383. An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, on the first Monday in October in each year.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, general debate is closed by order of the House. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; general storekeepers, receiving ships and other vessels; commutation of quarters for officers on shore not occupying public quarters, including boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, warrant machinists, pharmacists, and mates; pay of enlisted men on the retired list; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice boys, including men in the engineers' force, and for the Fish Commission, 25,500 men and 2,500 apprentices under training at training stations and on board training ships, and for men detailed for duty with Naval Militia, at the pay prescribed by law, $16,138,199.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have no desire at this time to discuss the matter that was up a few minutes ago in general debate, the order of General Smith "to make Samar a howling wilderness and kill everybody capable of bearing arms," but I will read three or four lines from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5354, being a telegram from General Corbin to General Chaffee, dated April 15, 1902, as follows:

Press dispatches state that upon the trial of Major Waller, of the Marine Corps, testimony was given by Waller, corroborated by other witnesses, that Gen. Jacob H. Smith instructed him to kill and burn; that the more he killed and burned the better pleased General Smith would be; that it was no time to take prisoners, and that when Major Waller asked General Smith to define the age limit for killing, he replied, "Everything over 10."

If such testimony was given, and the facts can be established, you will place General Smith on trial by court-martial.

Mr. Chairman, the last sentence of this order was conditional. The condition was:

If such testimony was given and the facts can be established, you will place General Smith on trial by court-martial.

"Such testimony" must have been "given by Major Waller," and facts must have been capable of being "established," because the court-martial or trial of General Smith was ordered, and he was tried and a verdict rendered but not yet published, the verdict being sealed and is now en route to Washington for President Roosevelt to first open.

Now, I say I have no desire now to discuss this order, but I simply want to put this order of General Corbin by order of the President down in the RECORD side by side with another statement. On April 25 I clipped from the Philadelphia North American, a Republican paper, the following:

GENERAL SMITH ADMITS ALL THE CHARGES—HE ORDERED MAJOR WALLER TO KILL ALL "OVER 10 YEARS OF AGE"—COURT-MARTIAL OPENS—HIS COUNSEL DECLARES THAT SAMAR BOYS ARE AS DANGEROUS AS THE MEN.

MANILA, April 25, 1902.

The trial by court-martial of Gen. Jacob H. Smith on the charge of conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline began to-day. Gen. Lloyd Wheaton presided. Col. Charles A. Woodruff, counsel for the defense, said he desired to simplify the proceedings.

He was willing to admit General Smith gave instructions to Major Waller to kill and burn and make Samar a howling wilderness; that he wanted everybody killed capable of bearing arms, and that he did specify all over 10 years of age, as the Samar boys of that age were equally as dangerous as their elders.

Capt. David D. Porter, Marine Corps, and Lieut. John A. Day, Marine Corps, were the only witnesses examined. Their testimony developed nothing new.

Maj. Littleton W. T. Waller, Marine Corps, will be the only other witness for the prosecution. He was unable to be present to-day on account of sickness, but it is expected will be in attendance to-morrow.

The defense will call several officers of the Ninth Infantry.

General Smith then in open court confesses to having given this "fire and sword" order. There should no longer be any doubt about this.

You will all remember, Mr. Chairman, that this order of General Smith was brought to light in the court-martial trial of Major Waller for enforcing this order of General Smith, and Major Waller acquitted himself by saying, "I simply obeyed the orders of General Smith, and his orders were to make Samar a howling wilderness and to kill every person capable of bearing arms." When asked to put a limit on the "order" as to age, he replied, "Ten years." But I presume a boy under a tree with a gun or with the native soldiers, in or out of camp or action, was killed.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire now to discuss this "order." General Smith gave the "order," and it was obeyed and had to be obeyed. The "Army" does not give "orders." The officers, the head officers, give "orders," and the "privates" have to obey them. The "privates" did not want to obey this order, and General Smith says so over his own signature, as shown by the Army and Navy Journal of ten days ago.

The American, the paper from which I have read this order and General Smith's confession, is a Republican paper, and the order I first read was issued by General Corbin and is found in the RECORD, at page 5354, and found in the hearings before the Senate Committee on the Philippines, pages 1548 and 1549.

Mr. Chairman, we went to war with Spain because she treated the Cubans just as General Smith has treated the people in Samar. We stopped the "fire and sword" policy in Cuba and begun it in the Philippines by "orders" from generals who fought in Cuba, as General Smith did.

I should like very much to have discussed this bill, but the time has been taken up by others in discussing this "order" of General Smith.

I presume I may be permitted to proceed for a few minutes anyway.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a first-class navy, one commensurate with the needs of our Republic. I have supported measures for that purpose and shall continue to do so. But I do not want the Navy turned into a "commercial drummer." I am in favor of what we have, a peaceful commerce with all the world. But we can have that without an unnecessary army or navy as advance agents.

Now, the question is, What about a navy because of our oriental possessions?

If we retain permanently the Philippine Islands, the very highest authority on that subject, Admiral Dewey, says that we must have a large navy in, and because we are in, the Philippine Islands, because we are in the waters that are plowed by the war ships and patrolled by the war dogs of the "war powers of Europe." Of necessity, he says, we must have armed vessels there to protect the sovereignty of the United States.

The sovereignty of the United States is as much in the Philippines as it is here; and if that sovereignty suffers or is in part destroyed, it affects the sovereignty of the United States everywhere.

Now, in order that my colleagues and the members of this House may act with their eyes open, I desire right on this question to read from the first volume of the Schurman Philippine report. It is a report signed by Mr. Worcester, Mr. Denby, Admiral Dewey, General MacArthur, and Professor Schurman. It is not signed by General Otis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. General Otis did not sign this report, although he was a member of the Commission. It is signed by Jacob Gould Schurman, George Dewey, Charles Denby, and Dean C. Worcester, and John R. MacArthur as secretary. As I have said, General Otis did not sign this report, although a member of the Commission. He was making war on the Filipinos, fighting every day, while these Commissioners were trying to find what these people wanted and bring about peace if possible. But General Otis was so busy keeping up the war that he only attended one meeting of the Commission, remaining on the Commission all the time. Strange indeed! He rather ignored this Commission anyway. They were subordinate to him, the general in command, although he was one of the Commissioners.

Before I proceed further I want to stop a moment to say that I congratulate the House that we have such a full and able report on this bill and our Navy, and I believe I will not incite a spirit of jealousy among the members of the committee when I say I believe the chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] very largely merits our compliments for this report.

While in the Old World this last year he industriously studied the navies there, and we see he has given the House the benefit of his observations to a great and valuable extent. I will now resume the reading of this document.

I will read again from Admiral Dewey (vol. 1, p. 127, of this Schurman Commission's Report), as follows:

As our interests in the East and in questions affecting it have increased greatly since our possession of the Philippines, we should maintain a permanent fighting force of ships on the Asiatic station, including battle ships and armored cruisers.

A permanent fighting force in the Philippine Islands, he says.

The distance and the time that would be required for reenforcements to arrive in case of attack by a foreign power show clearly the necessity for keeping a strong enough force on the spot to make such an attack improbable.

The necessity for a moderately large fleet being clearly shown, it is necessary to establish naval and coaling stations for its repair and supply.

Again, on page 129, Admiral Dewey says:

It has been shown above that nearly all of trade communication in the islands is necessarily by water, and that a considerable force of expensive war vessels must be maintained in the Philippines.

We have determined, from necessity it is claimed by the Republicans, to maintain on the "spot" in the Philippine Islands a standing army of 30,000 American soldiers and 5,000 natives, costing us annually about $1,285 per American soldier and half price for the natives, or about $42,000,000 per year, exclusive of armament and fortifications, which cost about $7,000,000 per year. This makes about $50,000,000 per year for our standing army in the Philippine Islands.

Then this "standing" navy of and for the Philippine waters will cost what to build? We see the naval board "estimates" are said to amount to $98,910,984.63. Whether this is over or under the mark I can not say. I will content myself by reading a paragraph or two of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] in yesterday's RECORD, and those who have plenty of time can make the estimate:

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much are they to cost?

Mr. FOSS. The cost of these ships, in accordance with plans recommended by the Board of Construction, amounts in all to about $30,000,000. The battle ships, which will be ships of 16,000 tons each—the largest battle ships of any that we have—will cost $7,532,000 apiece.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does that compare with the cost of constructing such vessels heretofore?

Mr. FOSS. Our battle ships heretofore have cost anywhere from $6,000,000 to six and a half million dollars.

A MEMBER. Inclusive of ordnance?

Mr. FOSS. Inclusive of everything; that is the completed cost.

Now, the armored cruisers will cost $6,700,000 apiece, and the gunboats $510,000 apiece, making in all a total cost for 2 first-class battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats approximately $29,500,000.

Now, there are several boards in the Navy Department whose business it is to recommend naval programmes. One is the general board. They have recommended the building of something like 35 ships. Then there is the Board of Construction, which recommended to the Secretary of the Navy the building of about 40 ships.

And the Secretary of the Navy made a recommendation, I think, calling for 22 ships in number. I have not counted them up. He asked for 3 first-class battle ships, 2 first-class armored cruisers, 3 gunboats of 6,000 tons displacement, 3 gunboats of 2,000 tons displacement, 3 picket boats of 600 tons displacement, 3 steel training ships of about 2,000 tons displacement, 1 collier of 15,000 tons, and 4 tugboats, and while the recommendations of the different boards have been had, yet it must be remembered, of course, that the men who recommend them are naval officers ambitious for the profession in which they are engaged and are desirous of seeing our Navy built up as fast and speedily as possible; but this committee—and I refer to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—composed of the representatives of the American people, have to decide for the people themselves as to how far and how fast we shall pursue the policy of building up the American Navy.

Now, in view of the fact that Congress intimated in the appropriation bill of last year that it was its wish that the Secretary of the Navy should report only upon two battle ships and two armored cruisers, the Committee on Naval Affairs did not think it wise to make any further recommendation, and that is the reason why we come here with a programme to-day of two battle ships and two armored cruisers and two gunboats, in all, a total tonnage of 63,000 tons, requiring an appropriation of $30,000,000, not in this bill, but in subsequent bills, to construct them, because we believe that we are carrying out the intimation and suggestion of Congress in the appropriation bill of last year. Now, we have had greater programmes than this in years past.

Under the naval appropriation bill of March 3, 1899, we provided for a total tonnage that year of ships to the amount of 104,000 tons, and under the appropriation bill passed June 7, 1900, we made the further increase in ships to the amount of 99,930 tons. The programme this year, if it pass by the committee and the House and Congress, will add only 63,000 tons to the tonnage of our Navy; and so I say to you that it is a moderate increase, it is a healthy increase, but I believe that it is none too large if we are to continue the policy of building up the American Navy, and building it up in such strength and power as to maintain the honor of our country and to back up our foreign policy in every port and harbor throughout the world. [Applause.]

We all want to and will "maintain the honor of our country." No doubt about that. We have done that at all times; but the vital question is, shall we start and uphold a "foreign policy in every port and harbor throughout the world," to do which we must turn our Republic into an empire, turn our backs on the policy of the fathers, keep a standing Army in the United States and the Philippine Islands, and build and maintain a Navy big enough to whip all Europe in case of war in the Philippine Islands, which may occur at any time?

The Naval Board of Construction says we must build 40 ships; the general board says build 35 ships, and the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long, says build 22 ships. For what? "To back up our foreign policy in every port and harbor in the world."

These big ships cost $7,532,000 each. This bill carries in time of peace appropriations amounting to $77,659,386.63, about as much as we appropriated when we were in actual war with Spain. Such a "foreign policy" as this demands immediate, careful, and patriotic attention; and hence I thus speak, though briefly, to lay the subject before the House and country.

[Nashville American, 1902.]

THE FORT PILLOW "MASSACRE."

In the Senate Tuesday the remarks of Mr. TELLER on the Philippines were interrupted by Mr. SPOONER, of Wisconsin, with the inquiry: "Does the Senator not remember Fort Pillow?" The Associated Press account of the day's proceedings then states:

"What does the Senator mean by his reference to Fort Pillow?" inquired Mr. CARMACK, of Tennessee.

"I had in mind," replied Mr. SPOONER, "what has been considered a massacre of colored troops there."

Mr. CARMACK insisted with some heat that there was no massacre of troops or killing of prisoners at Fort Pillow.

Mr. CARMACK is correct, and it is strange, indeed, at this date that intelligent and honorable men will persist in falsifying history and endeavor to blacken the fame of soldiers and officers whose only crime was service in the Confederate army.

The so-called massacre at Fort Pillow grew out of a report of a committee of Congress which was made shortly after the fight there and was framed to soothe the wounds of the North over the successive defeats of Federal troops by General Forrest.

The committee reported that (1) Forrest had taken advantage of a flag of truce to shift his men to a more advantageous position; (2) that after the fort had been carried by storm an indiscriminate slaughter, which spared "neither age nor sex, white nor black, soldier nor civilian," was carried on; (3) that after the fighting had ceased several of the wounded of the garrison were intentionally burned to death in the barracks and tents which were destroyed by fire, and (4) that the "rebels buried some of the living with the dead."

The report is based on testimony of two or three of the officers and some of the negroes and whites who were of the garrison; but we think there is to-day not an impartial military critic, North or South, who would undertake to indorse it, or who would not say that it was false in every particular.

A full and complete account of the taking of Fort Pillow by General Forrest is given in Dr. Wyeth's life of Forrest. In it Dr. Wyeth makes no attempt to suppress any fact nor color any circumstance, but he shows, or rather the testimony of such men as Maj. Charles W. Anderson, Lieut. Col. D. M. Wisdom, Gen. James R. Chalmers, Gen. Tyree H. Bell, Col. Robert McCulloch, and Col. R. C. Barteau shows, beyond the suspicion of a doubt, that no advantage was taken of the flag of truce; that while the truce was in force a steamer loaded with Federal soldiers approached Fort Pillow, and that another steamer with artillery on board was also steaming toward the fort intent on rescuing it; that no signal of any kind was made to the boat from the fort or from the shore, which was a violation of the truce, and it was to circumvent it and prevent the landing of the steamers that General Forrest, in plain view of the commander of the fort made a new disposition of two detachments of men.

As to the second charge in the report of the Congressional committee, this testimony shows there were no women or children in the fort when it was assaulted and that such of the civilians as had the desire to go to a place of safety had the opportunity to leave. Those who remained voluntarily took up arms and fought with the garrison. Dr. C. Fitch, Federal surgeon of the Fort Pillow garrison, says:

"Early in the morning all of the women and all the noncombatants were ordered onto some barges and were towed by a gunboat up the river to an island before anyone was hurt."

The proportion of killed and wounded in the fort was large, and it is on this fact that the stories of the massacre of Fort Pillow have been based. Of the 557 in the garrison, 321 were killed, 130 wounded, and 206 were uninjured.

But it is to be borne in mind that the garrison, after full consideration during the flag of truce, refused to surrender, and never did surrender. The Union flag was never hauled down until cut down by one of Forrest's men. When the fort was stormed hand-to-hand encounters followed, many resulting in death, and those who attempted to escape by the river, as had been planned, found themselves cut off by the strategy of Forrest and caught between two fires of his men.

Again most of the negro soldiers were intoxicated, as were many of the whites, which made them reckless and indifferent to danger or death and inefficient for an intelligent defense of the fort. The commander of the fort had been killed early in the morning. The storming took place in the afternoon. There was no competent directing officer. It is also to be remembered that General Forrest had assured the commander of the fort that the black as well as the white soldiers would have full protection as prisoners of war if he would surrender.

As to the next charge, the garrison was not burned until the next day, when it had been entirely abandoned, all the wounded Federal soldiers having been taken aboard a Federal gunboat under a truce. And as to the fourth charge, of which the veriest savages would not be guilty, it was the Union soldiers who burned their own dead, and if any wounded were buried alive the work was done by their own comrades.

General Forrest himself had two horses killed under him early in the day and another wounded. One of the horses had fallen on him and bruised him badly. He was directing the attack from a little knoll, and as soon as he saw his men had scaled the parapet, and while the Federal flag was still flying, rode into the fort and ordered all firing to cease.

Dr. Wyeth states: "Among the mass of sworn testimony which will be presented further on it will be shown that with but one exception, the perpetrator of which was arrested by General Chalmers on the spot and placed under guard, not a gun was fired or a prisoner injured after the flag of the garrison fell."

The reason the gunboats gave the fort no more effectual aid is found in Forrest's instructions to Anderson and Barteau to have their sharpshooters cut down the gunners when the ports were opened. "Shoot everything blue betwixt wind and water until the flag comes down," were his exact words.

The testimony as given in Dr. Wyeth's book of a few well-known Tennesseans who were present at the engagement may be of interest.

J. C. McAdoo, of Watertown, states that he saw the whisky in the fort, and filled his canteen from a barrel by the consent of a guard who had been placed to watch it by General Bell. He says there was no surrender.

Joseph Smith, of Dyersburg, states: "I was one of the detail to gather up the guns after the fighting was over, and wherever we found a dead Federal we found a gun. In regard to the whisky found, I did not see it myself, but heard it spoken of at the time. I am a farmer and have lived in Dyer County for seventy years."

Dr. J. S. Harrison, of McMinnville, says: "The garrison kept firing at us as they retreated down the bluff. I am certain no one was killed after the fight closed."

W. C. Wert makes this affidavit: "I saw several buckets of whisky sitting within the works as we captured the place."

Lieutenant Hager says: "I saw the vessels of whisky, and know the flag of the fort was not lowered until it was cut down by Private Doak Carr, of our (Second Tennessee, Barteau's) regiment."

Dr. D. C. Kelley testifies that a day or two after the fight at Fort Pillow, in a conversation with General Forrest in regard to the colored troops, the general said that he was opposed to the killing of negro troops; that it was his policy to capture all he could and return them to their owners.

But it is unnecessary to adduce further testimony to prove the malignant falsity of the charges against General Forrest and his men at Fort Pillow. And even if testimony were lacking their courage and valor in every engagement, and in every campaign, and the whole course of their lives, in peace and in war, would brand the charges in the minds of honorable men as unworthy of consideration. Forrest and his men fought hard, but always nobly and humanely. They gave security and safety to the homes of the defenseless, and for their acts of valor and courage are entitled to and will ever receive the grateful acknowledgments of their fellow-countrymen.

"A considerable force" of what, Mr. Chairman? "War vessels must be maintained in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. Chairman, I am reading from high authority. I get this from an official report, where it has been possibly sleeping ever since it was printed.

Unfortunately very considerable amount of valuable information that is obtained for our guidance, to enlighten us, at least, is put into these records and never comes to light again.

The point that I desire to make is, that this high authority says that inasmuch as we have gone from this side of the world to the other side, where we are in a war ourselves, a war that seems will "not down," and where the dogs of war of Europe are plowing the seas the year round, we must have a Navy to maintain American sovereignty over the islands. This distance is so great we must have a large navy there at all times on the "spot," as Admiral Dewey says.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Navy: For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., $10,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill for a little information. Can the chairman of the committee tell the Committee of the Whole how much money is appropriated in this bill for our new possessions over there; also, what are the estimates of the naval board for naval work in these colonies?

Mr. FOSS. In this bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Well, I can point that out a little later. I will state that to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman did not exactly cover that in his speech, and I should like to get this information.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $100,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Emergeney fund" to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1902, and until such time as Congress shall make specific appropriation for the pay of such employees.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proviso to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. RIXEY. This bill makes provision for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903. The proviso provides that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow certain payments for the year 1902. I insist that the proviso is not germane to the paragraph or to the bill. If there is a deficiency for 1902, it ought to be provided for in some other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point is that it is not germane?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes; and it is also new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman makes the point that it is new legislation, he will sustain it; but the Chair thinks it is germane.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia—a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who knows the necessity for this provision—desires to make the point of order against it, the chairman of the committee concedes the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs knows that when this paragraph was reached in the Committee on Naval Affairs, I was opposed to the whole paragraph; and I shall not only insist upon this point of order, but I expect to vote to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I will state, Mr. Chairman, this is known as the emergency fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the paragraph. The Clerk will report the paragraph.

The Clerk again read the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on ageeeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN: I desire to call the attention of the committee to a few facts regarding this emergency fund. The members of the committee will see that in the preceding paragraph there is an item providing for the contingent expenses of the Navy:

For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad but impossible to be anticipated or classified.

Now, that is known as the contingent fund under this section, and is $10,000. In addition to this contingent fund there are numerous others running throughout the bill, and they amount, as I recollect it, to over $300,000. This emergency fund, the one I move to strike out, is a different matter, and it originated during or immediately after the war with Spain. At one time it was $500,000, in the last bill it was $200,000, and now provision is made for $100,000.

I will state that the Secretary of the Navy when he appeared before our committee stated that he had recommended $250,000—or, I believe it was $300,000—but he could get along with $100,000. That is but one illustration of the point that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] made yesterday, that it is our duty to scrutinize the recommendations of the Department, because here was a recommendation for two and one-half times as much as was admitted was necessary.

Now, when I move to strike this paragraph out, I think the motion ought to be carried, because all the payments which have absorbed this emergency fund are, and ought to be, either under the contingent fund or subject to the direct legislation of this body. For instance, I read from the hearings, and I am going to show you how the last emergency fund was disposed of, or a part of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that when such items are charged to the emergency fund we ought to strike out that fund and let these improvements come under the direction of this body.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman under what head in the last naval appropriation bill this fund out of which these sums he has enumerated were paid was carried.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It was paid out of this emergency fund. Now, the contingent fund allowed to the Department and to its various bureaus usually protects these contingent and unforeseen emergencies as described in the paragraph previous to the one I move to strike out. Under that they pay similar expenses. I will not take the time to read them here, because any gentleman can find them in the hearings: "Secret service, safety deposit storage, wages to civilians, transportation, entertainment of Brazilian officers, services of barges, etc., pay of carriage hire for officers on official business." Entertainment by the officers of the Brooklyn or by the "U. S. S. Brooklyn," etc.

Now, such expenses as these have been paid out of the contingent fund. I submit that the emergency fund ought to be stricken out and the Department ought to be held down to its ordinary contingent expenses. I submit that no power ought to be continued in the Secretary that enables him to construct buildings such as I have mentioned and incur expenses of that character.

So, Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the necessity for it when it was first placed in a naval bill it seems to me it is time for this emergency fund to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the provision.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will realize what this motion involves and will understand it before the vote is taken. I want to say that this emergency fund grew out of the necessities of the Spanish war. It was originally $500,000. There has never been a moment of time when members of the Naval Committee have not had an earnest desire and purpose to do away with this emergency fund so soon as it could be done without injury to the service. It has constantly been decreased and diminished. The last bill carried $250,000. That fund has been cut down in the present bill to $100,000.

In the presence of the full committee the Secretary of the Navy gave his statement that it was his purpose and desire to have this emergency fund done away with as speedily as possible. The matter was fully discussed, and he pointed out that there were contingencies and emergencies arising by reason of our foreign possessions that made it impossible for him to estimate item by item for everything necessary, and it was there determined in full committee that the fund could he cut down to $100,000, and that would be satisfactory to the Department. And I confess, Mr. Chairman, that it is with a considerable degree of surprise that I notice this motion coming, after that satisfactory arrangement in the committee, from a member of the Naval Committee.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Do you mean to intimate that that action in the committee was unanimous?

Mr. DAYTON. I mean to say that the statement in the hearings was that it was satisfactory; and my recollection distinctly is that no objection was made to it when the appropriation was reduced from $250,000 to $100,000.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman's recollection is at fault.

Mr. DAYTON. Well, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that there are two or three members of the Naval Committee on the other side whose standing some of us can never understand. When it comes to their action in the Naval Committee and from the Naval Committee to this House, it seems to me that the interests of the great naval establishment are not always considered, but that the chance to make objection is.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. The hearings show what occurred on that occasion?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIXEY. The gentleman says that he understood that this was satisfactory to the whole committee and was so expressed. Now, I want to find the page on which that occurred, for it will be found——

Mr. DAYTON. I will yield to a question. I am not yielding for a statement. The gentleman will have his chance under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RIXEY. I am going to ask you now a question. The Secretary, after stating that he had wanted $250,000, said: "I think we can get along with $100,000." The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] was the only gentleman of the committee who expressed any opinion whatever, and he said: "That would be entirely satisfactory."

Mr. DAYTON. I think that is exactly right; and I believe no member made any objection.

Mr. RIXEY. I want the gentleman to understand that he does not represent all the members of the committee.

Mr. DAYTON. Are you making my speech, or am I making it myself? I object to any further interruption. When I have a statement to make, I will not allow the gentleman from Virginia to make it for me, if I can help it. I say that the gentleman has quoted the hearings exactly right. The Secretary of the Navy stated in terms that it was the anxious purpose of the Department to do away with this emergency fund so soon as it could be done without detriment to the service. He said $300,000 was too much, and upon consideration, as appears there in the committee hearings, he stated that he could get along with $100,000. Then the remark came from me that that would be entirely satisfactory. And not a single other man made any objection, as I understood, at the time.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TATE. I know the gentleman does not desire to misrepresent gentlemen on this side of the House or anyone else, and therefore I want to call his attention to the fact that at the time this bill was reported to the House it was especially understood that as to any provision in this bill, if any member of the committee objected, the right was reserved to him to oppose it on the floor.

Mr. DAYTON. Unquestionably that was so.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia, who seems to want to make some personal matter of this, I want to say that it was certainly known to every Democratic member of the committee that I would make this motion again as I have made it heretofore. The intimation that any other member of the minority of the committee, either by silence or otherwise, ever waived any of our rights in this matter is not true in fact.

And as for the difference of recollection, while it is unpleasant for me to refer to these things, yet when the gentleman in his blustering way undertakes to reflect upon members on this side, I feel like telling this House that it is only a few weeks since the gentleman made a most positive statement of his clear recollection of something which had taken place in committee, and 11 members of the committee stated their recollection exactly to the contrary. And yet the gentleman undertakes to say that he would not believe our recollection on this matter.

Mr. Chairman, when he wants to reflect upon three members of this committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order in referring to other members of the House in the second person.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the gentleman may be allowed to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not wish——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in debate should refer to other members in the third person.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If I did not do so it was an unintentional omission.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that the first spark of personal feeling or difference should come from the gentleman from West Virginia. I regret that anything of that nature should be injected into this debate. But when the gentleman from West Virginia sees fit to say that there are three members on this committee who in antagonizing anything do not represent the views of a brave, intelligent, and enlightened constituency—if he means to say that these gentlemen are not as intelligent and as honest and as patriotic and as high-minded as any other members of this body, then I do think, Mr. Chairman, that it is time for the gentlemen upon whom he would reflect to call the attention of the House to the fact and to repel such unjust insinuations.

So far as I am concerned, I have no apologies to make to any man for my actions here, and am responsible to none except to the good people who send me here as their Representative. I will not sit here and see a member, because he happens to be senior in service, or because he happens to be in the majority upon the pending bill, reflect upon my rights and privileges in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an emergency fund for the Navy Department to meet unforeseen contingencies. My recollection is—and the gentleman will correct me if I am wrong—that an emergency fund for the Navy Department first appears in the naval appropriations at the commencement of the Spanish war.

Mr. DAYTON. It was for $500,000.

Mr. CANNON. Now, it has been reduced until you recommend $100,000?

Mr. DAYTON. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. I am frank to confess that I do not like emergency-fund appropriations. I believe that all appropriations ought to be as specific as possible, and then the contingent fund for the general service, and that to apply to the Department instead of running to all the bureaus and to each branch of the service. Now, I am not prepared to say, as I have not investigated the question, whether we can dispense with the emergency fund at this time. I am quite content to take the opinion of the committee, and would not have said a word were it not that I wanted to express the hope that the time had about arrived when we could dispense with all emergency-fund appropriations in either the Navy, or the Army, or the service elsewhere.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to interrupt the gentleman just a moment and to say that that is the policy of the committee; that we have been gradually year after year reducing this fund, and we hope to wipe it out entirely next year; but the Secretary came before the committee and said it was necessary to maintain it this year, but recommended a reduction down to $100,000.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman is satisfied it ought to be there for the good of the service?

Mr. FOSS. I am satisfied that for the good of the service it should remain, and I am opposed, as a general policy, to the insertion of the emergency fund.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the motion to strike out the last word, for just a moment or two. It has been from the beginning the policy of this committee to oppose these emergency appropriations, but because of the unsettled condition of affairs in the Philippines, and the condition generally which grew out of the Spanish-American war, it seemed to the committee that it was a necessity that there should be an emergency fund placed at the disposal of the President of the United States to be expended upon the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, and, as has already been said here, that fund at first was placed at $500,000. Subsequently it was reduced to $300,000. This year it was a very grave question with the committee as to whether or not the emergency fund might not be dispensed with altogether and no appropriation made. The matter was left open until the Secretary of the Navy appeared before our committee for the purpose of giving his testimony. When there, upon the general subject of the emergency fund, he used this language:

Most of these expenditures have been in the Philippines, where unforeseen contingencies arise.

Now, it was unforeseen contingencies that caused this emergency-fund appropriation, and if it was wise in the beginning it is wise to-day, because of the fact that these unforeseen contingencies have not passed away, but still exist. On the next page the Secretary used this language:

I am inclined to think that many things are still in such an unsettled condition that there ought to be some emergency appropriation. The estimate of $300,000 is perhaps too large. I do not think we shall need it. I do not think we shall need $250,000. I was talking to Admiral Kenney, who sees the propriety of getting rid of the emergency fund as soon as we can, and he suggested whether or not you could not increase my contingent fund. I have a contingent fund of from ten to twelve thousand dollars. It is an old form of appropriation for certain well-understood objects.

And then the Secretary of the Navy went on to say that that would not be sufficient to meet the contingencies that might arise in the Philippines, but thought that $100,000 would be ample and would be sufficient. We appropriated $500,000 at first when the condition of affairs was more unsettled than it is to-day, when the contingencies that met us were more appalling than to-day. If it was proper then, why is it not now proper to appropriate $100,000 and place it at the disposal of the President of the United States to meet such unforeseen contingencies as may arise in the Philippines? I hope this emergency fund will be permitted to remain this year, because it seems to be absolutely necessary for the successful maintenance of the naval establishment in our new possessions.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to refer to the statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] further than to state that at the time Secretary Long was before the committee, and that hearing took place to which reference has been made, I was not present. Afterwards, when the emergency paragraph came up for consideration in committee, I voted against it. I will state further that some of the gentlemen who are now favoring this provision also expressed their opinion against it.

This provision in the naval bill was carried for the first time during the Spanish-American war. There was no serious objection to it then, because we knew that many demands were made upon the Government which could not be foreseen. But now, four years after the close of that war, when the Secretary of the Navy has a contingent fund at his disposal, when almost every Bureau in the Navy Department, I believe without exception, has a contingent fund, there is no necessity for carrying this emergency fund longer. This emergency fund is nominally under the control of the President, but, as a matter of fact, it is used by the several bureaus and the Secretary of the Navy for other purposes. It seems to me that, four years after the close of the war, we can, without detriment to the service, cut out these extraordinary provisions, and the emergency fund which had its origin with the Spanish war ought to be cut off. We should legislate for the erection of buildings in the Philippine Islands, and for clerks there, to which this fund has been applied, just as we legislate for other items in the naval establishment. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is time that we get rid of this emergency fund, and I hope the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] will prevail.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JACKSON of Kansas, for ten days, on account of important business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION ACT.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 99.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The joint resolution (S. R. 99) fixing the time when certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," shall take effect from and after July 1, 1902, except as otherwise specially provided therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if this resolution has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. CURTIS. A similar resolution was considered this morning, and a favorable report was directed limiting it to section 8 only. This is a general resolution, but its effect is similar to that of the one considered by our committee. The object is to fix the date for the taking effect of section 8 of the act, which creates a new judicial district in the Indian Territory. It is requested by the Attorney-General, and the report in favor of the resolution was unanimous.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does it affect that one case only?

Mr. CURTIS. There are two or three other items that it might affect, but that is immaterial. It simply fixes July 1, 1902, as the date when certain provisions shall take effect, and there can be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. I also ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter of the Attorney-General asking for this legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter from the Department bearing upon the resolution just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1902.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In the bill or act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," there is legislation dividing the northern district of the Indian Territory into two districts; also authorizing the appointment of an additional United States marshal, an additional United States attorney, and other officers; also fixing additional places for holding terms of court, etc. It is deemed important that said legislation shall not take effect until July 1, 1902, in order that all necessary appointments may be made before that time and business arranged in accordance with the provisions of said act.

If said act shall be allowed to take effect immediately upon approval, much confusion is likely to result; also much additional expense will be caused thereby, as is more fully explained by the United States marshal for the northern district of the Indian Territory in his letter dated the 9th instant, a copy of which is inclosed herewith.

It is therefore considered important that a joint resolution (a draft of which is herewith inclosed) should be passed without delay, in order that it may be approved by the President before the date of the approval of the above-mentioned act.

Respectfully, P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

HERMAN GAUSS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is authorized to provide in the general deficiency appropriation bill for the payment to Herman Gauss of $750 for services as acting assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We would like to understand what this resolution is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, let us have an explanation of this.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen ask for an explanation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This is the allowance made to that gentleman, which usually goes into the general deficiency bill. Under the present system we come to the House and ask that it be inserted in the bill, and that the committee be directed to insert it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the resolution been considered by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am directed by the committee unanimously to ask for its passage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. By your committee. Ought it not to be considered by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. SULLOWAY. There is no occasion for it to go to the Committee on Accounts. There is no reason why it should that I am aware of.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Matters of that kind usually go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. SULLOWAY. It might, perhaps, be done in that way.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment. The gentleman from Tennessee will recollect that heretofore on the defficiency bill a number of items have generally been reported by the Committee on Appropriations touching extra compensation. I think one of the most worthy items that the bill has ever carried has been giving the extra compensation to the clerk detailed from the Pension Office—you may say the expert clerk—that works with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the Committee on Appropriations have concluded from this on, so far as it is concerned, not to insert items of this kind in the general deficiency bill unless requested to do so by action of the House. I have no doubt about the propriety of the item, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman feels that it is a proper item?

Mr. CANNON. I am satisfied from what I know of this official and the work he is performing, and from the practice heretofore, that he might well have this additional allowance in addition to the pay he receives from the Government as a Pension Office clerk; and it has been usual to give it to him. I think it is one of the few cases where it is justified by the merit of the case.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if he will yield to me, if unanimous consent is given, to offer an amendment? I do not propose to hold him up on the proposition, but I desire to offer an amendment to the proposition; and still I say if he declines to permit me to offer an amendment I will not hold him up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that while this has not gone to the Committee on Accounts, the Committee on Appropriations substantially refused to consider them; and I believe it would be an unwise precedent to establish in this House, without the consideration of a committee, to here now establish a precedent giving extra pay; and I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT—CASE OF HARRY C. MIX.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4446, entitled "An act for the relief of Harry C. Mix."

The Attorney-General writes me as follows concerning this bill:

"A. F. Holt was postmaster at Valdosta, Ga., and as such became a defaulter to the Government. Suit was brought on his official bond, and the amount was finally recovered. Criminal proceedings were also commenced against him, and he gave a bond for his appearance at court, with Harry C. Mix surety thereon. The defendant failed to appear, and forfeiture was taken.

"Assistant Attorney William R. Leaken represented the Government in the proceedings to enforce the collection of the bond so given. The papers relative to said case were referred to Mr. Leaken January 12, 1901. In reply Mr. Leaken said:

"'I do not think that this is a case where the proceedings ought to be discontinued. I do not know the history of the case prior to my appointment as assistant United States attorney, but as soon as the matter was placed in my hands it was called up, both for judgment on the bond in the civil case, at Macon, Ga., and upon the criminal bond at Savannah. One after another excuse was made by counsel for Mr. Mix, the surety on the criminal bond. * * *

"'I have moved on three different occasions for a rule absolute against Mr. Mix, but Mr. Strohecker, his counsel, has succeeded in postponing the matter. The case was set for final disposition on the 5th of this month, but again deferred at the request of Mr. Strohecker. I inclose a letter from Mr. Strohecker, which to my mind shows that the judgment should be taken up scire facias.'

"Mr. Strohecker was attorney for the defendant, Holt, and in his letter, dated March 21, 1899, to the assistant attorney, said:

"'Please find out as soon as possible whether or not the nol. pros. can be obtained in the Holt case. If it can be, I am pretty sure the money due the Government on the defalcation can be obtained and we can produce the man; we will have him present anyway, but no money will be paid on that claim unless a nol. pros. is entered.

"'I have found the man. He did not die as thought, but recovered, and I am in communication with him.

"'Could it be arranged so that the nol. pros. could be entered at Macon during this term of court? If it can be, please use your efforts to have it so done. Mr. Irwin being disqualified, of course it will require your presence here. If you so direct, after you have heard from the Department, I will speak to the judge concerning the noll. pros. and payment.'

"The defendant, Holt, it seems, went to Mexico and has never been tried. It is alleged that at one time Mr. Holt, the defendant, was about to be present at a term of court, when a deputy marshal said to him that the case would not be up at that term of court and it would therefore not be necessary for him, the defendant, to be present. Of course the deputy marshal was not authorized to excuse Mr. Holt from attendance, as required by his bond.

"It seems useless to require persons charged with crime to give bond for their appearance in court if they can remain away and the sureties on their bonds be relieved from liability. To give relief in this particular case seems to be but to set a bad example."

In view of the statements above set forth, I am constrained to withhold my approval of the bill.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, May 15, 1902.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, understanding that that bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, I move that the bill and veto message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to refer the message and the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CHARLES D. PALMER.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13371) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Palmer, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
N. B. SCOTT,
PARIS GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Was that the report or the statement?

Mr. GIBSON. The report.

The SPEAKER. Is there a statement?

Mr. GIBSON. There is a statement with the report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It should at least be printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us have the statement read, or something that will explain the action.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me a word, the only difference between the two Houses was that the Senate cut the rate $10 a month and more accurately defined the service of the soldier. It was a bill I introduced, and it is entirely satisfactory, although the rate has been cut a little below what it should have been.

Mr. GIBSON. The statement contains the facts, and I ask that it be read.

The statement was read, as follows:

This bill originally passed the House at $40 per month, but was amended in the Senate to $30 per month. The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate (second) amendment, and your conferees recommend that the bill pass at $30 per month, as it was amended in the Senate, the Senate receding from its first amendment as to name of organization.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
R. W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I just wanted to know what the report was. I have no objection.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ELIZABETH A. BURRILL.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following conference report upon the bill H. R. 12054.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12054) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Burrill, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
WM. J. DEBOE,
GEO. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk also read the following statement:

The service of the soldier in this bill was amended in the Senate from the "Fiftieth New York Volunteer Engineers," as it passed the House of Representatives, to the "Fiftieth New York Volunteer Infantry." The Senate amendment was an error, and the result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment, and the bill is recommended as it was originally passed by the House of Representatives.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
R. W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks this afternoon upon the naval bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GALLINGER. I report back from the Committee on Pensions favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8106) granting an increase of pension to Daniel J. Mahoney, and as this is a case of great urgency I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Daniel J. Mahoney, late of the U. S. S. Vandalia, United States Navy, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS H. CARPENTER.

Mr. PETTUS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 661) authorizing the restoration of the name of Thomas H. Carpenter, late captain, Seventeenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask that it be considered now.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 10, after the word "disability," to strike out the words "with rank and pay from the date of his appointment and retirement under this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Thomas H. Carpenter, late a captain, Seventeenth Infantry, a captain of infantry in the Army of the United States; and when so appointed he shall be placed upon the list of retired officers of the Army, unlimited, on account of wounds received in battle from which he is under disability.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN HANDFORTH.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4641) for the relief of Benjamin Franklin Handforth, to report it with amendments, and as it is for the relief of a man who is very ill, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 9, after the words "United States," to strike out the words "with the same rank and grade that he held on the date of his dismissal; and the President may, in his discretion, assign him to the first vacancy in his ascertained grade in said regiment or" and to insert in lieu thereof "in the infantry and to;" so as to read:

That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and hereby are, suspended for the purpose of this act only; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Benjamin Franklin Hanforth, late a first lieutenant in the Eleventh United States Infantry Regiment, a first lieutenant in the Army of the United States, in the infantry, and to place him on the retired list of the Army, the retired list being increased in number to that extent.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy, and to submit a report thereon.

I wish to say to the Senate that I shall endeavor to call up the bill early next week, but will not now name the day. I invite the attention of Senators in the meantime to plans, maps, specifications, etc., copies of which are here on my desk and also in the rooms of the Committee on Military Affairs, showing the proposed extensive improvements to be made at West Point.

The bill contains, in addition to the annual supply items, a provision and appropriation comprehending those improvements.

Mr. CULLOM. How much?

Mr. WARREN. The amount will be when all is finished five or six million dollars. I hope Senators will give the matter attention, so that those interested in this necessary improvement may sustain and assist the committee.

Mr. BATE. The right is reserved to present a minority report if the minority so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LEASING OF INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART on the 13th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate certain alleged charges in connection with the leasing of the Indian lands on Standing Rock Reservation, contained in a letter of W. V. Wade in Senate Document No. 212, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, and for that purpose to send for persons and papers, take testimony, and have leave to sit during the sessions of Congress; and that the necessary expenses be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control its Contingent Expenses.

FRANCIS S. DAVIDSON.

Mr. QUARLES. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1115) for the relief of Francis S. Davidson, late first lieutenant, Ninth United States Cavalry, to report it with an amendment, and submit a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. Two bills from the Committee on Military Affairs have just been passed without objection, and I ask that this bill be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 3, after the words "authorized to," to strike out the remainder of the bill and to insert:

Revoke general court-martial orders No. 93, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, November 15, 1875, approving and confirming the proceedings, findings, and sentence of the general court-martial which convened at Fort Brown, Tex., September 18, 1875, dismissing First Lieut. Francis S. Davidson, Ninth Cavalry, and to issue to him a certificate of discharge of that date, and to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Francis S. Davidson a first lieutenant, mounted, in the United States Army, and to place him on the retired list, with the rank of first lieutenant: Provided, That no pay, compensation, or allowance shall be paid him from the date of his dismissal to the date of the passage of this act, and the retired list is hereby increased by one for said purpose.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to revoke general court-martial orders No. 93, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire what the officer was court-martialed for. What was the charge?

Mr. HOAR. There is a full report of the committee accompanying the bill. The report is made by the Senator's colleague. This is a man whom I knew personally. He lives in my native town of Concord, where his people live. He is an honest and brave officer. He was discharged for breaking an arrest and some other small offense—I think playing cards in the presence of soldiers—and was convicted. I am confident the conviction was unfair. At every time that this has come up it has had a favorable report from the committee. A great injustice has been done him. He has been given a place in the War Department until Congress might do him justice. This is one of the three cases from the Committee on Military Affairs, two of which have just passed the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not know anything about this case or by whom it was reported, but we have gone very generally at the present session into the business of revoking old court-martial findings and sentences, and I was curious to know what was the charge against this officer.

Mr. HOAR. If there was ever an honest case in this world it is this, as the Senator will find if he will read the report.

Mr. SPOONER. My colleague reported it?

Mr. QUARLES. I did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 15th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1305) for the relief of Mrs. Arivella D. Meeker.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, some few weeks ago, possibly two or three months ago—I do not remember the exact date—I read in the papers a charge against Major Waller, who was being tried before a court-martial for mercilessly killing 12 Filipino prisoners who were not resisting at the time, making no attempt to escape, who were alleged to have been killed without any cause existing and without trial. We also learned that in the progress of that trial Major Waller did not deny the killing of these men; he did not deny that they were prisoners of war, and did not deny that they were guiltless of anything to justify him in killing them, but he put his defense on the ground that an order had been received by him from Gen. Jacob H. Smith to kill everybody in the island of Samar above the age of 10 years, to burn all the houses and villages and towns, and to make the island a howling wilderness.

On the trial of the issue thus made up, an issue made up on a charge against him of murdering these prisoners, and a defense made by him of not only authority to do so but an order to do so by his commanding officer, who was a general, he was acquitted, and he was bound to have been acquitted because it was found that he had received the order which not only justified him, but required him as a military duty, to execute those prisoners and to execute them without a trial.

Then afterwards, as a necessary consequence, the War Department put General Smith on his trial on the charge of making this, which would seem at first appearance a cruel and heartless order. The newspapers bring us an account of that trial and they leave the clear inference that General Smith's acquittal is on its way from the Philippine Islands to the Secretary of War. Of course the finding of the court-martial is said to be a secret. It is alleged to be unknown whether the court-martial convicted General Smith or acquitted him; but the argument of Republican Senators seems to be pursued upon the assumption that in all probability the guesses of the newspaper correspondents in Manila are correct, and that General Smith has been acquitted of the charge.

Now, at first blush it would appear to a humane man that there must be something wrong somewhere that Major Waller is acquitted on the ground that he received this heartless order, or this order which seemed to be a heartless order, from his commanding officer, thereby proving the truth of the allegation he made—that he had received a command from his superior officer to kill and slay everybody above 10 years of age.

I say that it would seem at first blush that there was something wrong somewhere when he was acquitted upon the proof of that fact, and then when General Smith is acquitted of the charge against him either upon the proof that he did not make the order or that if he made it that the exigencies of the case justified it.

I notice in the papers that the necessity for a great deal of the testimony was eliminated by the frank admission on the part of counsel for General Smith, Colonel Woodruff, that he did make the order to kill everybody above the age of 10 years and he did make the order to burn and to leave the island a howling wilderness.

We are told that we must not discuss it because it is sub judice. It is hardly at this time sub judice from the information we have received in connection with it. To justify the position taken by General Smith in giving that order, his counsel, in the defense, said that the children of Israel burned everything and left behind them a cloud of smoke when they were leaving bondage in Egypt.

I suppose it is necessary for Republicans to support their policy to torture Scripture a good deal in the discussion of this question. We have seen that it has been assumed that the Almighty gave orders to Joshua to slay a certain people and therefore General Smith, presuming to exercise all the powers and all the authority of the Almighty over the creations of the Almighty, gave orders for the extinction of the population of an entire island.

So this counsel, who seems to have made a very eloquent speech in the defense of General Smith, distorts Scripture for General Smith's defense. He untertakes to make it appear that a people who were the chosen people of the Lord had gone out of bondage and out of the country in which they were held in bondage, setting fire to everything that came in their way and leaving a pillar of cloud and of smoke behind them.

I have read that in the Scriptures, and it reads to me about this way, if I recollect it correctly: "And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light; to go by day and night; He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people." So the cloud of smoke was not left behind them. There is nothing said in the Scripture about the cloud of smoke, but the pillar of cloud in which the Lord went was in front of them, leading them.

But in the defense of the order made by General Smith, necessitated, as I shall assume, by the exigency of the policy that is being pursued by the party in power—for to this assumption is the trend of their argument—he referred to cruelties that were practiced by the English Government as a justification for cruelties that were practiced by General Smith.

I know that there is a considerable disposition by the party in power to follow the course of the Kingdom of Great Britain, but I trust that that will be abandoned. I know that we have a departure from the old ways of the fathers in that we are sending ambassadors to witness the coronation of the King of Great Britain. I know that it is charged, and not without good reason and good evidence to substantiate it, that there is a military post in this country for the recruiting of the armies of Great Britain against the Boers, a small republic, but I hope the time has now come that the Republican party can see its way to abandon that course.

Let us see some of the cruelties that are practiced by the Government cited as an example for us to follow. Some time ago I received this card from some ladies in Philadelphia:

MEMORIAL.

We believe international Christian citizenship demands that American women protest against the outraging and starving of Boer women and children in British camps in South Africa.

A majority of the best people in Britain are protesting against it.

German and Irish Americans are protesting, but the American element of our Republic is criminally silent.

Please consult with thy friends and advise as to what better be done.

Mary T. Burgess, Margaret E. Burgess, M. D., Sue M. Webb, Lillian M. Hudnut, Alouise C. Longstreth, Louise C. Longstreth, Sarah M. Price, Aseneth C. Moore, Annie Waldie, Sarah M. Carver, Mrs. William Ashley Leavitt, Pauline Imlay Maclean, S. Sue Cooper, Eliza H. Townsend, Elizabeth W. Whitney, Mrs. Hughes O. Gibbons, Mary F. J. Greene, Helen Roberts Cooper, 3 North Front street, Philadelphia.

I can not put in the RECORD the picture of the starved Boer girl that is on this card.

OUTRAGING AND STARVING CHRISTIAN PATRIOT WOMEN AND CHILDREN OF SOUTH AFRICA.

This picture of a starved 8-year old Boer girl at Bloemfontein represents only one of numerous cases, many of them worse. British officials would not allow their pictures to be taken. Their homes were burned and they not let to take beds and blankets from the fire; but they were rushed by horsemen—many of them London criminals—to worse than Spanish "concentrado" camps. These brave (?) soldiers of "Christian" England also forcibly violate the women prisoners—many of the refined Woman's Christian Temperance Union ladies—they drive into these camps. Yet Woman's Christian Temperance Union officers and organs smother anguish cries from the camps. This is "toadying" to the Tory English element, which is to blame for all this—a Tory element that for over a century has been a deadly enemy to Christianity, temperance, and civilization around the world, especially so to our country, commercially and politically. It is winter there now, and women in childbirth and with pneumonia are freezing and starving. Offers of humane relief committees to better care for them is refused.

NOTE.—This tract is indorsed by Rev. Lewis Grout, D. D., who was a missionary in South Africa of the A. B. C. F. M. for fifteen years.

With cruel cunning, these camps are located at points on railways selected to protect the railways from attacks of husbands and fathers of these women and children.

Is not silence of American Christians and of our Government at such a time criminal? These outrages are against military and international law and usage of civilized nations. Is it not time for protest of no uncertain sound? Failure to protest may hurt the President and also his party.

The brutality of British soldiers to Boer women and children is natural. It is what they have been doing for generations, as proved by high British authority. The Duke of Wellington said (p. 227 of Naval Wars, by President Theodore Roosevelt): "It is impossible to describe the irregularities and outrages committed by the troops. There is not an outrage of any description they have not committed." Page 228, General Napier said: "At San Sebastian a girl of 17 was the victim of atrocity which staggers the mind by its enormous, incredible, indescribable barbarity."

No wonder that history records the Tory Britons, sires of those now fighting the Boers, as paying the Indians $5 each for scalps of Pennsylvania women and children. And later, of Canadian women drowning their children on the approach of victorious United States troops in our war of 1812. They naturally supposed our soldiers, when successful, would do as British soldiers did. No wonder when Switzerland offers $100,000 and trained surgeons and nurses to care for sick and starving women and children, the British war office declines. This, too, in face of international rules of war making Red Cross aid always in order.

The death rate among Boer prisoners would exterminate them in five years.

Mr. Fred. Lavelle, an American telegrapher, two years in the Boer cavalry, says: "Irene is a camp near Pretoria. All females from 12 years up are taken there and herded like cattle. Batches of them are taken to Pretoria for immoral purposes, and tortured into submission by officers and enlisted men. We have often had girls of 16 returned to us whose hair was white as snow."

Do not these conditions make silence of every American citizen criminal? Failure of our Government to protest, treason to civil and religious liberty around the world? Our Administration is sowing the wind, to reap the whirlwind by this country in future.

Is the root of trouble in the disgraceful silence of our Government a Secretary of State who was "toryized" when he was minister to England?

INDIGNANT AMERICAN CITIZEN.

This is the conduct as described by these ladies of a country in prosecuting a war that is cited as an example for the American Government in prosecuting the war against the Filipinos, and as a justification of General Smith's order to kill everyone over 10 years of age, to burn everything in sight, and to leave the island a howling wilderness. It would have been better to kill everybody under 10 years, as well as over, than to alone kill those who were over 10 years of age, because the result of it would be the starvation of those under 10 years of age, which would be far worse, far more horrible, and far more cruel than their immediate slaughter.

I read some time ago a semiofficial report of one of the British officers in South Africa, in which it was said that of a thousand of these poor Boer people in concentrado camps 252 had died in six months, making an average of more than 50 per cent in 12 months. I do hope that the time has passed when anyone defending the policy of the Administration in the Philippine Islands will hold up England and her policy as an example to be followed by the American people in face of the facts which are known to the American people this day in reference to the war in South Africa.

I had intended, Mr. President, to take up something that was said by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] about the conduct and about the record of General Funston. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to do that, except to make one reference to it.

The Senator from Kansas said that one of the certificates of the greatness and the glory of General Funston was that he had served on the staff of Gomez during the war between Spain and Cuba, and before the declaration of war by the United States against Spain. The New York Herald sent a correspondent, George Bronson Rea, to Cuba to get the facts in Cuba, which were sent back in letters and afterwards put in book form, and in that book, the title of which is Facts and Fakes About Cuba, on page 237, after telling of his visit to the army of the insurrectionists in Cuba and his visit to Gomez, he says:

Three big negroes appeared leading a mere boy. They came to where we were seated, and, after saluting, the corporal explained that the boy had stabbed and killed his worn-out pack horse during the march. The lad could not have been more than 14 years of age, and I learned that he was employed as an officer's servant, and marched with the impedimenta.

The little fellow then attempted to tell his side of the story, stoutly protesting his innocence of the charge. Gomez eyed him critically, and although I had only known him for an hour, I could see that the kindling fire in those deep-set eyes brooded no good for the prisoner. Like a little man, the boy stood there and boldly asserted that his accusers were unjust. This seemed to infuriate the old chief, and, calling to the guards, he said:

"Away with him! Bind him securely, and place him under guard in the escort, for I intend to shoot him as an example to other offenders of his class."

The boy threw himself on his knees and begged his chief to be lenient and forgive him, but he did it in such a matter-of-fact way that it appeared as though he was shamming, for not a tear coursed down his cheeks nor was there a tremor in his voice.

As they laid hands on him to carry him away he made another appeal to his austere judge.

His answer was as unexpected as it was dramatic; for, whipping out his machete, the old man sprang out of the chair and made a vicious cut at the poor little fellow, who fortunately dodged.

"Get out of here, you young whelp!" shrieked Gomez, as he made several other cuts in his unsuccessful attempts to reach his victim, who was hurried away by the guards.

They went on, and afterwards they captured a train of cars pulled by an engine. They did not know how to destroy it. It had been stated to General Gomez that this man Rea was an engineer, and Gomez then asked him to destroy the engine. He continues:

"As I did not wish to compromise myself by any action that might imperil my standing as a neutral, I simply ordered the Cubans to open the blow-off valve, after first satisfying myself that there was not sufficient fire in the furnace to completely destroy the boiler. When the valve was broken the quick rush of steam and water made a great noise. Gomez probably thought the boiler was going to explode, for he dug his spurs into his steed, and, followed by his staff, went down the road like a flash."

When the Senator from Kansas was putting in as one of his tributes and eulogies to General Funston that he was a member of Gomez's staff, I wondered if he was one of the staff who dashed down the road away from that steam.

This Herald correspondent goes on to show that Maceo was a brave man and a brave general, who stayed on the firing line and fought like a soldier, and that he was a humane man, but that Gomez was not.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it the purpose of the Senator in reading that to raise an inference that General Funston is a coward?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The purpose of that is to show what this New York Herald correspondent says with reference to Gomez and his staff. The junior Senator from Kansas read a great many certificates of the greatness of Funston, and, among the rest, was the fact stated that he was a member of the staff of Gomez, and I have just read what this correspondent says about the staff of Gomez. The Senator can draw whatever inference from it occurs to him. These I give as extracts, and every man can draw his own inference in reference to them.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that it is significant at all, but the Senator is mistaken in saying that I said that General Funston was on the staff of Gomez. I did not make any statement of that kind.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. How did you connect General Funston with Gomez?

Mr. BURTON. He was under Gomez as a soldier. He was promoted from captain to major and from major to lieutenant-colonel, had charge of the artillery, and was wounded, shot through and through, later on. He was at no time on the staff of Gomez.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Still I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, as he says Funston was under Gomez and the Senator from Mississippi says that Gomez ran away from steam, therefore the logic of the Senator from Mississippi is that Funston also ran away from steam. So I do not see that his logic is impaired.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. With all due respect to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], I do not need his support to sustain any of my logic.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to ask if the Senator will yield to me again?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. In all candor, do you have any doubt at all as to the courage and bravery of General Funston?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I do not know General Funston. I know nothing about him except what I have heard since he has returned from the Philippine Islands. Since he has charged the American soldiers who have made statements with reference to what transpired in the Philippine Islands with making them without any foundation at all and with making them as mere braggadocio to attract attention to themselves, I know from what I have seen in the public prints and what I believe has been admitted by the Senator from Kansas—and I have never seen it denied—that General Funston has himself gone over the country exploiting his career in the Philippines, a privilege that he does not allow to the soldier who has to carry a rifle. I do not know anything about his courage, but the rule is that men are courageous, and until it is shown that a man is not courageous the presumption is in favor of his courage. I believe the charge made by General Funston against the American private soldiers is a slander, as inexcusable as his diatribes against all American citizens who oppose imperialism.

But inasmuch as one of the certificates of General Funston was that he was a member of the Cuban army, and I understood the Senator from Kansas to say a member of the staff of Gomez, if he was a member of that army and fought so valiently under Gomez, I put in all the evidence so that those who read it can draw their own conclusions about it.

Mr. President, there was another argument made in the progress of this debate, that was made, I believe, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which consisted in the reading of a number of editorials from Democratic papers advocating the retention of the Philippine Islands or advocating their acquisition. I take it for granted that a sufficient answer to that would be to read, as an offset, articles from Republican papers and from Republicans who oppose. If it is a good argument to establish the wisdom and expediency of the policy of the Republican party in acquiring the islands by conquest and retaining them to show that Democratic editors have advocated the policy, then it is a refutation of that, it occurs to me, to show that Republican editors have opposed it. Here is a Republican paper, and I believe its Republican proclivities are not denied in the State of Massachusetts—the Springfield Republican. On the 25th of April that paper used this language:

> There was another sworn witness before the Senate Philippine investigating committee Monday to tell a harrowing story of torture and devastation in the work of benevolent assimilation.

Now, mark you, there is no Democratic slander in this. No Democratic Senator or Democratic citizen or Democratic paper is uttering this slander against the American Army. This is from a Republican paper:

> He was Lieut. Grover Flint, of Cambridge, connected with the Thirty-fifth Volunteer Infantry in operations in northern Luzon, and testified to seeing not simply one application of the water cure, but a score, in some of which he had himself participated to prevent "excesses." His idea of what constituted an excessive treatment may be better understood when he said that in cases presumably unexcessive he had seen the teeth of the victim fall out when he happened to be an old man. He told of the burning of villages in order to drive the people into woods or the concentration towns, and when asked where the Army borrowed that from he promptly replied: "I saw it in Cuba, under the authority of General Weyler."
> Exactly. When Professor Sumner wrote of the Spaniardizing of the United States as a result of the war over Cuba he wrote more exactly in accord with the fact probably than he knew. The American people, who were driven into a frenzy of excitement hardly four years ago by the Weyler cruelties, and were eager for war to revenge them, have themselves, either ignorantly or otherwise, been resorting to or tolerating the same practices for precisely the same end—to enforce the subjection of an unwilling people, and subjection to a sovereignty far more strange and alien than ever was the Spanish to Cuba. But we have out-Weylered even Weyler in cruel practices. We have added on the torture of the water cure, which is now being shown to have been applied not in few and isolated cases and by native scouts only, but quite generally and under the direction of American officers.

And the editor might have added that the water cure was applied not only to the Filipino natives, but to an American private soldier, because that soldier happened to get hold of some whisky, got drunk, and did something that a sober man ought not to have done and would not have done. This he might have added to the accounts he had already given. Practically the gagging and torturing to death while gagged of a private soldier because he got drunk on some of the whisky exported from this country as a part of the commerce for which the islands were purchased.

> Probably never before in all history has there been so complete and sudden a turn about in the attitude of a great nation as the world has witnessed in the case of the United States since four years ago this date.
> But to the mass of the American people we must believe that these revelations come as a surprise and shock. There have been innumerable reports coming from the islands all along, and upon responsible authority, of these same practices—of tortures, village burning, reconcentration, and widespread devastation to enforce loyalty to our invasion—and no one who has paid any attention to the Philippine affair, as it slipped through the fingers of the censorship, can have been in ignorance before or can be surprised now. But the masses of the people have paid little attention. They have been engrossed in matters nearer home. They have been disposed to accept at face value the assurances from the instigators and sponsors of the policy of conquest that all is up to the American standard and wholly good and benevolent.
> Now, however, that the truth is being forced upon the country's attention through an official investigation, we may fairly look for an awakening to the facts and a revulsion of sentiment in respect to this bloody and barbarous business of whipping a strange, weak people into unconditional subjugation to our will. The American people as a mass, we may believe, are more true to the traditions, principles, and ideals of their country than has been made to appear. They will right themselves on this question as the way we are now going becomes lighted up. At all events, the revelations being made must finally close the mouths of that most respectable but queer-minded contingent of the army of imperialistic aggression who have affected to see in it all only the ends and processes of Almighty God.

Those are the utterances of a Republican paper—not of a Democratic paper, and not of a Democratic Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say to the Senator that the Springfield Republican is only Republican in name, and that it does not support the Republican party, either in Massachusetts or in the country, ordinarily.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Ordinarily?

Mr. GALLINGER. Ordinarily, yes.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When was it that paper quit supporting the Republican party?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that that paper ever supported the Republican party.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Do you know that it never did?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that it ever has. It is a Democratic paper and is so recognized.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Is the Philadelphia North American a Democratic paper?

Mr. GALLINGER. We are not talking now about that paper.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I am talking about it, and I am going to read from it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Here is what the Philadelphia North American says. I believe this is Mr. Wanamaker's paper:

> [Philadelphia North American (Republican), September 20, 1900.]
> Expansion beyond the seas accompanied by professions of high and noble aims can find standing room in the court of morals, but expansion by force of arms in order that markets may be created and opportunities for investments made is too much like exchanging blood for dividends to be popular with a people who have been nurtured on the generous maxims of the Declaration of Independence.

The Springfield Republican, I am told by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], does not ordinarily support the Administration, but he does not know when it quit supporting the Administration; he does not know whether or not it was ever a Republican paper; but he certainly will not deny that the Philadelphia North American, from which I have just read, is a Republican paper.

The same paper, the Philadelphia North American, of January 11, 1900, says:

> Whatever we might have deprived ourselves of had we accorded independence to the Filipinos, we manifestly should have spared ourselves the necessity of putting beyond the protection of our Constitution millions of human beings with inalienable rights over whom we have assumed sway and whom we are ready to kill should they dispute our mastership.

Another utterance from a Republican paper, which I put as an offset to the argument of the Senator from Ohio, when he read the utterances of Democratic papers advocating the acquisition of these islands.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senater state that the Philadelphia North American is a Republican paper?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That is my understanding of it. Does the Senator say it is not?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that will be news to the people of Philadelphia.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Does the Senator say that Mr. Wanamaker is not a Republican?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What Wanamaker?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. John Wanamaker.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This is not John Wanamaker's paper, as I understand.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I understand that it is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is his son's paper, and is very much such a paper in Philadelphia as the New York Journal is in New York.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It is news to me that John Wanamaker has a son who is such a Democrat as W. R. Hearst, of New York. When men like John Wanamaker, who are Republicans, are raising Democrats like W. R. Hearst to edit Democratic papers, there is some hope yet for the country. [Laughter.]

I will read again from the Springfield Republican, and maybe by this time it is a Republican paper. In its issue of February 13, 1901, that paper said:

Yes, and in present greatness let us not forget the day of our small things, when the fathers faced England as the people of the Philippine Archipelago face us to-day, in trouble and protest. Small heed is there in some minds for that distant plaint, the laborious formulation of grievances strikingly like those which severed the relations of the American colonies with the British Crown.

Here again comes another extract from the Philadelphia North American, edited and controlled and owned by the son of John Wanamaker, who has raised him to be a Democrat. This is from the issue of January 2, 1900:

Are we in danger of priding ourselves upon our material progress rather than upon our fidelity to the ideas that have made us great—the ideas of the Declaration of Independence? Are we in danger of following in the footsteps of other powers that have risen in the past and fallen because they misused their strength—forfeited their own freedom because they sinned against weaker people in depriving them of their inalienable right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? It has been our glory that we have stood upon a higher plane than the predatory and conscienceless monarchies of Europe—that we have recognized the claims of justice as mandatory, and that no sordid gain in trade and territory could compensate us for conscious doing of wrong. We have taken as our national code of morals the same code that is obligatory in private life. And that has been our chief glory wherever the names of Washington and Lincoln are known.

Now, if there is anything questionable about the Republicanism of the son of John Wanamaker, who the Senator says is the editor of the Philadelphia North American, I will just offset that by saying that it was stated on the floor of the Senate the other day by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] that the Commercial-Appeal, of Memphis, an extract from which was read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], is owned in great part by the lieutenant-governor of the Philippine Islands, Governor Wright, who, I believe, draws $15,000 a year salary.

I am glad to see that the Philadelphia North American takes issue with those who believe that we ought to take as our model "the conscienceless monarchies of Europe."

Here is an extract from the Philadelphia Press, in double leads. I understand that is the paper of Charles Emory Smith, the late Postmaster-General. I hope he, too, has become a Democrat, because when I see such men coming over to the Democratic party I see an evidence of the healthy condition of the morals of our country. There is hope for the country when leaders of the Republican party like those are getting into the Democratic party and advocating Democratic doctrines and Democratic principles. Let us see what he says. I read this extract from the Springfield Republican, into which it was copied from the Philadelphia Press, in which paper it appeared, as the Springfield Republican states, in "double leads."

[From the Philadelphia Press, in double leads.]

"A MONSTROUS ORDER"—SO EX-POSTMASTER-GENERAL SMITH'S PAPER CHARACTERIZES IT.

Gen. Jacob Smith, commander of the American forces in Samar, and now arraigned before a court-martial at Manila, begins by admitting that he issued the order to "kill and burn," to make Samar "a howling wilderness, and to slaughter all persons above the age of 10 years capable of bearing arms."

The fact thus confessed is shocking and astounding. It is almost incredible that an American officer of any rank could have issued an order so shameful, inhuman, and barbarous, and it calls for instant rebuke, repudiation, and condemnation. We say this before hearing or considering his defense, for no defense can excuse such an order of ruthless and indiscriminate destruction.

We are told here that we must not say anything because we have not heard from General Smith and do not know what his defense is. The editor of the Philadelphia Press—an affable, genial gentleman—who, not long ago, was in the Cabinet of the present Administration, at the head of the Post-Office Department, and resigned that position to again take charge of his paper, the Press, in Philadelphia, says that—

No defense can excuse such an order of ruthless and indiscriminate destruction.

The order could not have been carried out. Even though given it is certain the American name was not dishonored by its execution. The first inquiry that springs to every mind on reading that such a monstrous order was really issued is whether it was really enforced. It is plain that it was not. Had it been the world would have rung with the horror. Major Waller, who has already been tried for acting under it, was only accused of killing two.

The fact was that he was accused of killing 12, and did kill 12; and he admitted that he killed them without a trial.

There was manifestly no large and general slaughter. At least we are spared that shame.

Here is a paper making excuse for the Administration, making a defense of the Administration, making a supposition that can not be borne out; and yet it is a supposition that condemns the policy of the Administration, a supposition, made manifestly in the interest and in the defense of the Administration, which can not be maintained; and yet a supposition that condemns the Administration, because it does not know whether it is carried out in other instances or not. In one instance it was carried out by Waller, because Waller admitted that he slaughtered 12 helpless and defenseless prisoners because of this order of Smith.

The article continues:

But the fact of the order, though abortive or unexecuted, remains. Since it is admitted the only further plea is justification. But what justification? It may be said that it was retaliation for wanton, indiscriminate, treacherous murder and barbarity on the part of perfidious Filipinos in disregard of all the laws of war. If there had been such warfare on the other side a degree of retaliation was legitimate, but not such universal killing and waste as the order seems to contemplate.

To be sure not, because in that island it is admitted that about 50 per cent of the population were friendly to the American people at that time and loyal to the American Government; and yet, in order to get the guilty, they would sweep the whole island of its men, women, and children, and of its houses, and make of it a howling wilderness.

It is still almost inconceivable that it meant what it appears to mean on its face.

The American troops have carried on campaigns in different parts of the Philippine Archipelago. They have fought through Luzon; they have fought on Negros; they have quelled insurrection in Panay and Cebu; but nowhere have they remotely approached the spirit or the policy of General Smith's incomprehensible order for Samar.

Now, then, there will be some defense if, when we hear from the court-martial, we hear the finding that he was guilty and that severe punishment has been inflicted upon him. But if we hear that he was acquitted even with this horrible order in his mouth, admitted by him through his counsel, and that he has been given back his sword as a brigadier-general in the American Army to go forth and again disgrace the Army, then there can not be any excuse made even by the most ardent defender of the Administration.

That order, we believe, had no authority or sanction; it was an individual act; it must be immediately denounced and disavowed, and its author deserves punishment which will make him and all others understand that such atrocity will receive no toleration from the American Government or people.

To decide whether it has authority or sanction or not they tell us we must wait, and we will wait to see what is the result of the court-martial of Smith, because not only was Waller acquitted on the establishment of the fact that the barbarous order was given, but if it turns out that Smith, who has admitted in this trial that the order was given, has been acquitted, then it does have authority and sanction. If he is permitted to remain in the American Army after such an order as that is given it will not be for the Administration to say hereafter that the order had no authority or sanction, because the very retaining of him in the Army, the very acquittal of him by the court-martial, will be an indorsement of the order and the sanctioning of it. It will be no longer an individual act, but it will be an act of the Administration whenever it turns out that he has been acquitted or let go with inadequate punishment, retaining his commission; and I am of opinion that when we hear from the court-martial we will hear he has been acquitted.

Here is another article from the Springfield Republican of May 2:

GENERAL SMITH'S ADMISSION.

Gen. Jacob H. Smith denied at the Waller court-martial that anything in his orders had justified Major Waller's acts in the campaign of Samar. But he was overwhelmed by the testimony of other officers, and now, in his own court-martial, he admits the truth of the charges Major Waller flung back at him. If there has been another military trial like this in American history, it is happily lost in oblivion.

Is there any Senator on either side of this Chamber who can not join in that sentiment? A general in the Army strenuously denying that he gave the orders that were attributed to him by Waller, and when the overwhelming testimony proves that he did give the order, and when Waller is acquitted on that overwhelming testimony, then when he is put upon his trial he admits that which he denied before; and it is to be hoped that no man will refuse to join with the Republican in hoping that "if there has been another military trial like this in American history it is happily lost in oblivion."

But the Smith and Waller trials must forever remain conspicuous because they throw such a terrible light upon the methods of war employed in the Philippine conquest.

General Smith's defense of his course will be heard in the trial, and when it has been presented we shall know from the verdict of the court whether it receives the approval of military judges. Meanwhile he confesses that he ordered his subordinates to "kill everything over 10" in a population of several hundred thousand, and to make of the island "a howling wilderness." Let us not do General Smith injustice. He meant boys over 10, and not girls.

Is not that a terrible plea, when the best that can be said of a general in the American Army is that he did not mean to kill girls and women over 10 years, but boys and men.

But why did he fix the limit at 10? Why not 8 or 6? It might be asked also how General Smith's soldiers were to know whether a child was over or under 10.

I have heard it said he did not say to go and kill them without a trial. Now, if there had been a trial, what would have been the necessity for a trial? The only necessity on the face of the earth which there could have been for a trial would have been to ascertain whether the child about to be shot was under or over 10 years of age; because if Smith's order was the law, the law of the case said if he was over 10 years of age, kill him.

And when they were in doubt about the age what happened?

This case will blacken the record of the American Army and the history of the American people for all eternity. In attempting to find instances that surpass in savagery the orders of General Smith you will search Spain's record in those islands in vain. We shall see whether there is any defense for such an atrocity which the military court of a civilized nation will accept and which a civilized people will pronounce good in the eyes of the world.

That is from a paper in New England, which I understand to be a Republican paper.

That is not all. Here is another article from the same paper of March 21, 1902:

When we read that we recall the stanza from Burns:

I waive the quantum o' the sin,
The hazard of concealing;
But, och! it hardens a' within
And petrifies the feeling!

AN EARLY PROTESTANT ON RECENT IMPERIAL UTTERANCES.

To the Editor of the Republican:

Some of us protested over three years ago against the subjugation of the Filipinos. We urged the rights of those distant peoples; we pleaded that justice be done them. But our chief argument proceeded along other lines. We condemned the policy of conquest and colonization, because it would seriously and permanently injure our own nation. We claimed that it would lessen our respect for human rights; that it would educate us in cruelty; that it would impair our own blessings of liberty; that it would tend to brutalize the American heart; that, in short, it would debase our ideals and divert us from our highest and noblest services to mankind.

Only a few months have passed, and what sad wreckage of true Americanism; what terrible fulfillments of their fears! Behold the price that we are paying for our imperialism! Can any thoughtful American citizen seriously consider the changes already made in the spirit of many of our people without shame, amazement, and forebodings?

When President Schurman, of Cornell University, a fair and competent authority, mildly pleads that independence be granted the Filipinos as fast as expedient, what happens?

I wonder if President Schurman has turned to be a Democrat since he was appointed by this Administration to a position in the Philippines?

A general in the Philippines hotly tells him: "If you said that here, we would put you into prison!"

They have the authority in the Philippine Islands, if utterances like these are made in the islands by President Schurman, to put President Schurman in prison. They have stifled free speech there. Their policy advocates the stifling of free speech here, because when men debate this question in the Senate or upon the hustings they are met with the statement, "You must not talk about this. It is dangerous to our people in the Philippine Islands when you express your opinion against the policy that is being pursued by the American administration in the Philippine Islands, and you must hush it." In other words, they are pursuing a policy which demands for its support the suppression of free speech and the suppression of the press; and I tell you that any policy that requires to be sustained by the suppression of free speech and the suppression of the press is a policy that is bad for the American Government and can not be pursued unless the American Government suffers from it, and that is what they propose.

That is what the flag has come to mean to our conquering soldier. That is what the "blue coat" feels after three years of subjugating inferior races.

The lesson of imperialism—indifference to free speech and to human rights—has been quickly learned. This is what comes of keeping the Constitution at home and sending the flag where the Constitution does not go. But is not this ominous incident enough to arouse us from our lethargy and remind us that our own liberties are not safe while we are destroying the liberties of others?

What a truism! How can it be put stronger than it is put in this article? Are our liberties not in danger when we start out for the destruction of the liberties of another people? Can you maintain the principles upon which our liberties rest and upon which our Government is based and at the same time destroy the liberties of another people who are offering to establish a government just exactly like ours, upon just exactly the same principles, and who are teaching the same doctrines that have been taught by our people since before the commencement of the Revolutionary war?

If anyone wants to know the cost of our imperialistic bauble, let him take the measure of it in this assault on the freedom of speech.

If a Congressman protests against the laws arbitrarily enacted in Manila that make reading the Declaration of Independence in its streets an act of treason, he, too, is denounced as a traitor and accused of causing the death of our soldiers.

No wonder this paper in the State of Massachusetts, when it heard the senior Senator of that State denounced because he advocated the freedom of speech wherever the American Government reigns, when he advocated the Declaration of Independence wherever the American Government has power and authority, when he advocated the carrying of the Constitution to any people who are under the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, when it saw him charged with treason and of being a fit subject for the gallows, should have written this; and I can tell Senators that until this policy that has produced so much trouble to the American people, that has cost more than 10,000 lives of American soldiers, that has made so much distress and caused the shedding of so many tears in American homes, and that has agonized the hearts of so many mothers and wives and sisters because of the deprivation of the society and the comfort of their loved ones, is abandoned, this same thing will be heard all over this country, not only from Democrats, but from Republicans, and Republicans who have been loyal to the party since its origin.

Is this the expansion of America or the coronation of Cæsar? If we have soldiers anywhere in this world where a plea for the ideals of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln by patriots here at home subjects them to danger, is it not high time that we bring them back to duties genuinely American?

If a patriotic clergyman denounces as barbaric the order of a United States officer in the Philippines, when he commands that natives must prove their loyalty or they will be summarily shot as public enemies, we are told that if in Manila he would be forthwith banished to Guam. Is this a harvest that any true American can contemplate with pride and equanimity? If such a fruitage follows a few months of Asiatic expansion, how much of our glorious heritage of freedom will be left at the end of a generation?

When a Senator refers to Lincoln as an advocate of a government resting upon the consent of the governed, prominent editors call him an "ignorant blatherskite," and people in the street say that he ought to be clapped into jail for aiding the savages in Samar who are fighting our soldiers! Is it possible that Americans have so soon forgotten what our poets have sung, what our statesmen have expounded, and what our patriots have died to establish? There is no sadder spectacle to-day than that presented by the descendants of Revolutionary heroes, who, in their zeal to defend a policy of conquest and despotism, misrepresent our history, trample into the dust the fair ideals of our nation, and despoil our great national leaders of the honors which they won as advocates of human rights.

And when some of the most eminent men in our nation present a petition to Congress asking that all honorable means be used to repress cruelties and bring about a cessation of bloodshed in the Philippines, General Funston uses these words at a banquet in Chicago:

"Gentlemen, some time ago two poor fellows, colored soldiers of the Ninth Cavalry, deserted and went over to the enemy. They were caught and hanged. It would be eminently more just—take this as you like, for I mean every word I say—if some of those alleged Americans who have lately signed a petition to Congress asking for a conference with the Filipino leaders still in the field were hanged and their memory forever execrated by the American people."

Oh, the shame of it! And a large company of prominent citizens cheered him vociferously!

But who is General Funston? It is he who wrote two years ago: "I hope that when they (the Filipinos) are conquered they will be made to feel for many years the iron hand of military rule—the only kind for which they are suited. I think the islands a most valuable acquisition. Their natural resources are almost beyond computation. From a strictly money standpoint they are great."

How well his wish has been carried out may be seen by reading an impartial account recently printed in the Boston Transcript, a strong Administration paper. The Washington correspondent of that paper ("Lincoln"—a careful and conservative writer) reports a Republican Congressman as making these statements after a visit last summer to the Philippines: "They never rebel in northern Luzon because there isn't anybody there to rebel."

I suppose we will learn directly that the Boston Transcript has quit the Republican party and has come over to the Democratic party. [Reading.]

That country was marched over and cleaned out in a most resolute manner. The good Lord in heaven only knows the number of Filipinos that were put under ground; our soldiers took no prisoners; they kept no records; they simply swept the country, and wherever and however they could get hold of a Filipino they killed him. The women and children were spared and may now be noticed in disproportionate numbers in that part of the island. * * * I look for no real peace short of such measures as those pursued in northern Luzon.

And when the interviewer asked him whether he thought the American people would approve such a policy of extermination, he calmly replied, "I have no doubt of it." And then he proceeded to make this statement, one of the most damnable in all history: "If American investors find property that they want in the Philippines, I do not think they would be embarrassed by any sentiment at home against the sweeping off the Filipinos."

Look at that in all its naked, cold-blooded and, hideous savagery; barbaric selfishness carried to the very summit of fiendishness. Look at it, disciple of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and tell us what you think of it. Look at it, compatriot of Garrison, Phillips, and Sumner, and feel the shame of it. Look at it as a Christian and an American, and by your vote pass judgment upon it.

How such talk as that will endear us to the benighted Filipinos. We may be sure of one thing: There are no savages in the Philippines who can quite equal in brutality the propositions made by this Congressman and by General Funston. How such talk as this will confirm the peoples of those islands in their hatred of us and hedge up the way of missionary, teacher, and philanthropist. It is such talk as this that prolongs the insurrection. One remark like this will lead to a thousandfold more bloodshed in the Philippines than all the petitions of the anti-imperialists. Pleas for cruel subjugation like those of General Funston, and boasts of wholesale slaughter to make robbery easy, like that made by this Congressman; these are the things that will foster the passions that will stab and slay our soldiers over there.

And how American liberty begins to suffer here at home. While we are in the evil business, no matter how black the crime committed by our officials there, however much those island peoples may need our protection, if any man enters a protest against the wrongs being done or advocates their rights, he is at once grabbed by the throat and some demagogue howls, "Let us hang this traitor, for he is inciting those colonists to kill our soldiers." This evil is no vague dream; it is even now upon us. Do these incidents, revealing a most unfortunate lapse from true Americanism, open out before us a pleasing prospect? Do they not bring us face to face with an impending calamity?

It is to be earnestly hoped that the American citizen will realize before it is too late that his own liberty is at stake. The solemn and sublime truth that we, as a nation, need to lay to heart is this: We can not be tyrants in Manila and keep our own freedom. The bayonet that unjustly pins a fellow human being to the ground lets out our own lifeblood.

JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER.

ANN ARBOR, MICH., March 13, 1902.

I am not going to read any more of these, Mr. President. There are a great many more of them that I could read, Republican papers and from Republican sources, and I might read from the statement of Republican Senators to offset the papers that were read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as Democratic papers advocating the policy of the Republican party in the acquisition and retention of the Philippine Islands. I do not intend to read any more of them. I will let these go in as a full offset to that argument, if argument there is in it.

Mr. President, there is one other argument that has been made to which I will make brief allusion, and that is that Providence threw these islands into our lap, that it was an act of destiny and an act of Providence. If that be true, what have we done to requite Providence for it? When Providence throws into the lap of a natural mother a new-born babe, she brings it to womanhood or to manhood under her nurturing care and protection and love. If Providence has thrown this archipelago as an infant into our laps and made us the mother of this infant and of this archipelago, how have we as the natural mother treated that infant? We have not only sent our soldiers to burn, to kill, to destroy, and to make a howling wilderness; we have not only subjected the natives to torture to which they were never before subjected, but we have sacrificed more than 10,000 of our own soldiers. We have subjected our own soldiers to a policy that has caused them to be tortured and treacherously killed. I commend this, without saying more on the subject, to the careful consideration of Senators who indorse this policy.

Now, then, let us get at the root of this evil. It will not do to recriminate. It does not answer the argument to say that human nature has caused in the breast of the American soldier a feeling of retaliation when his comrades have been treacherously slain, and therefore that he has tortured Filipinos to death. It is no answer that peaceable Filipinos taken and put into absolute abject slavery, penned up into camps where they had no room to lie down to sleep at night after being worked as slaves ten hours in the day under guard, driven to exasperation thereby, turned upon their masters and slew them when they had an opportunity. I say it will not do to make these answers. We must take the whole matter as it presents itself to us, the slaughter of Americans and the slaughter of Filipinos, the barbarous treatment of American soldiers by native Filipinos and the barbarous treatment of native Filipinos by the American Army and American officers, and then trace it to its source and deal with its source, the root of the evil, if there is a root of the evil, the policy that has brought about all this.

I feel and appreciate that if it should be required of the American Army that tens and hundreds of thousands of her soldiers should be slain in order to protect the honor of the country, every right-thinking patriot is willing that the sacrifice should be made, even though he should be one of those to be sacrificed. But has there been any assault upon the honor of our country? Was there any in the incipiency of this trouble? Was there any necessity, by the laws of governments and of war, that we should embark upon the conquest of this people, because of a trouble between the soldiers of Aguinaldo and the soldiers of the American Army, when some of them became involved in a personal difficulty, a personal encounter? If it is answered that there was a necessity for it, I deny it; but if it ever existed, the necessity has ceased, because we are told that the Filipinos have been subjugated and that there is peace there, even though it be such a peace as Tacitus described in the British Isles after they had been overrun by the Roman troops.

I will read an article in reference to the conquering of peace, from the Washington Post of May 6, 1902, an ably edited and well-conducted paper in this city:

IT MUST BE OVER NOW.

Our latest victory in the Philippines has very properly been made the occasion of a message of felicitation from the President. The engagement seems to have been of a thoroughly desperate character and the carnage without precedent. In his report to the War Department General Chaffee says: "Have never seen or heard of any performance excelling this gallantry and grit." He describes it as a hand-to-hand struggle in four lines of ditches under the walls of the Moro fort, and says the trenches are lined with Moro dead from rifle fire. In fact, though the fort was defended by many hundreds of the rebels, only 84 of the misguided wretches survived. Among the dead are two sultans and one rajah, not to mention scores of assorted officials of greater or less rank, while dead dattos—whatever a datto may be—are lying about almost everywhere.

Of course, a victory so overwhelming and so bloody was not achieved without great loss of life on the part of our own troops. General Chaffee reports 1 officer and 7 enlisted men killed and 4 officers and 37 enlisted men wounded—an appalling total of 8 killed and 41 wounded. Adding these together, we get a casualty list of 49—say 50 in round numbers—and dividing these among the four lines of ditches in which the furious hand-to-hand struggle raged for hours, we find that each ditch cost us 12½ men all told. A careful perusal of all the various accounts of the affair will enable one to at least dimly understand this excessive mortality, for it appears that the rebels, after exhausting their ammunition, threw away their Mausers and resorted to those deadly and destructive native weapons, the bolo, the kriss, the parong, and the kampilan, with which they fought like maniacs. It is, perhaps, true that as many as 20 out of the 50 casualties suffered by our army in the battle of last Saturday were due to the ruthless use by the Moros of their parongs and kampilans.

It is reassuring to hear from his own lips that Governor Taft is pleased with the triumphs of our arms in Mindanao and believes that their effects will prove beneficent. We have learned to repose the utmost confidence in Judge Taft's opinions and predictions relative to affairs in the Philippines Ever since he solemnly announced the fourth and final termination of hostilities, two years ago, we have refused to accept any view of the situation in our new islands which did not have his sanction and indorsement. The fact that the war has been brought to an end on six different occasions since the governor's original proclamation serves only to confirm our estimate of his wisdom. A bad thing can not be killed too often.

But the war must really be over by this time. After the failure of the kriss and the parong, even the toughest Moro ought to realize that the "jig is up."

We have the assurance from Governor Taft that the war is again over, and if, as a pretext to go on with this war, it was necessary to show that the American Government was powerful enough to whip the Philippine republic, it has now been subjugated four times, Governor Taft being witness.

While I am reading from the Post I wish to read another article which expresses this in much better language than I can, and then I shall not read any more articles:

THE QUESTION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Administration orators and organs will not succeed in smothering public disapproval of the Philippines scandal by the impudent pretense that such disapproval is equivalent to "abusing the Army." It is evident that this policy has been adopted. The keynote has been struck, and of course the chorus will soon be in full voice. But the expedient will prove a disappointment to its authors. The American people are not fools.

In the first place, nobody has abused or dreams of abusing the United States Army. It may please the apologists of our Philippine policy to reply to specific charges of wickedness and imbecility by reciting the glorious achievements of American arms, from Lexington and Chalmette down to Guasimas and San Juan Hill, but it will please no one else. The subterfuge is too transparent. It has not even the charm of originality or of intellectual merit. The people here at home who criticise and deplore the Administration's blunders in Luzon, Samar, Mindanao, and others of our new island possessions are perhaps quite as familiar with the courage and devotion of the American soldier as any of the gentlemen now vociferously engaged in reminding them of those high qualities. The men who saw war at Antietam, Missionary Ridge, and Gettysburg are not likely to forget the claims of their compatriots to everlasting honor and renown. There is a species of insolence in this attempt to silence public opinion by appealing to the chronicles of our military exploits in the past. It is as insolent as it would have been some eighteen centuries ago to quote Scipio Africanus in defense of Nero.

Our soldiers are as fine and gallant fellows as carry muskets anywhere in the world. We are proud of them. We hold the Army in gratitude and affection, and need no special pleader to speak to us for them. This issue is not to be beclouded by cheap oratory.

Nor is it less absurd for gentlemen on the floors of Congress or in the editorial columns of Government organs to claim that the hostile commentators on our Philippine policy are mere reckless partisans attacking the Republican party for campaign purposes. Such a device might impose upon children under 10—the limit fixed by Gen. Jacob Smith in his order of extermination—but it excites only pity and contempt in the minds of thoughtful men. The Administration should pray to be saved from its champions. The Republican party should repudiate the attempt to identify it with the torture chamber and the shambles. This is a question of fact, not of party politics; it is a question of humanity, of civilization, of common intelligence and mercy, not of the courage and patriotism of the American soldier. The Administration and its policy are on trial, not the troops who endure the perils, the hardships, the death, and the agony of the campaign.

Let no Administration advocate delude himself with the idea that he can obtain respectful recognition as an impassioned defender of the Army. We repeat: The American people are not fools!

Now, in conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to invite the Senators who are defending this policy to a discussion of the policy itself, to show where is the necessity for it. I challenge them to show that there was a necessity for this policy in the beginning. I challenge them to show first that in the commencement of this policy it was not an abandonment of the doctrines and principles on which our Government was founded and upon which it has lived for more than a century. Then when they shall have shown that, as I believe and assert that they can not do, but if to their satisfaction they think they have shown it, I challenge them to show wherein there is a necessity now, after they have told us time and again that peace has been established, for pursuing this policy that is causing the death by treachery and assassination of American soldiers, American citizens, and the burning and destruction of the islands, which it has been claimed by the Administration, have been thrown into our lap by the hand of Providence.

Mr. DEBOE. Mr. President, the pending bill proposes to establish temporarily a civil government for the Philippine Archipelago. While we may not agree as to the various provisions of the bill, it seems only fair and just that an honest effort should be made by the Senate to relieve the situation in these islands. I can not see any good reason for not continuing the wise and patriotic policy of President McKinley in dealing with the Philippine Islands; and when I say this I fully realize that there has been great objection on the part of some to a continuation of this policy. The bill indorses the action of the President in creating the Philippine Commission to exercise the power of government, according to the instructions given by him to the Commission. These instructions had for their object, first of all, the future welfare of the inhabitants of those islands, in teaching them the principles of self-government and preparing them for the great responsibilities of a republican form of government. We must remember that the Filipinos, including the inhabitants of all the territory of the archipelago, are composed of many tribes and different races and mixtures of races. In each province they speak different languages or dialects, hence the great difficulty in preparing them for the arduous duties of an independent form of government. The selection of such able and distinguished citizens as Governor Taft and his associates on the Commission was a guaranty to all well-thinking men that the work had been trusted to worthy hands and would inspire confidence in the public that the object of this Government was not exploitation, but the general welfare of those people.

The bill, taking it as a whole, seems to deal fairly and justly with the whole Philippine question, and while I shall not attempt to discuss it in detail, not having had the opportunity of hearing the evidence produced, I do approve of the measure as being a great improvement of the conditions in which we found those natives of the islands. It deals with the mining interest, the land and real estate questions, and especially the lands owned or claimed by certain corporations and the friars. I hope to see the most liberal treatment of the rights of the inhabitants as to public lands. It ought to be arranged so as to open up the lands to settlement by the people and guard against too much liberality toward corporations. I believe in a generous and liberal policy in regard to questions of this kind. It is, of course, to the interest of the islands to invite capital to aid in the great work of internal improvements, and corporations should be treated fairly. If I have read history correctly and understand the facts there has been and is now great opposition toward the methods of the friars, who own large bodies of land, and the methods whereby they came into possession of them are very questionable. It is to be hoped that those matters will soon be remedied. But no unjust action should be had affecting the rights of any religious denomination which has for its object the bettering of the condition of mankind. This bill gives the Philippine government the power to regulate these matters, which undoubtedly will result in great good. It protects the rights of the people by inaugurating a judiciary system and grants the right of appeal from the decrees of the highest court there to the Supreme Court of the United States involving a certain amount.

It seems to me that the bill treats all questions involved, from my view as to the duty of the United States toward the islands, fairly and properly.

For days we have heard many able speeches on both sides of this Chamber in the discussion of problems relating to the Philippines, and I am sorry to say some of them were loaded down with bitter, and what I claim unfair criticism. It is claimed that we have no right to be in those islands, and that we are oppressors instead of liberators. I deny it.

Mr. President, I would not have spoken had it not been for the wholesale attacks made upon every Senator upon this side who has supported the policy of Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt in the Philippines. But we all realize that it is much easier to find fault and criticise than to formulate and execute. Our rights to be in this archipelago have been called in question by some able and capable Senators as well as by eminent citizens in civil life. But why discuss this question? Every Senator or Representative of the House, as well as every citizen of the United States, who advocated action on the part of the Government in putting Spain out of Cuba by force of arms, helped to put us into the Philippines, and is as much responsible for the Army being there to-day as any Senator on this side of the Chamber.

The Spanish war unavoidably led the troops of the United States into the Philippines. It was fortunate for the country that Dewey had been sent into Asiatic waters to protect the rights of this country prior to the war. Every intelligent person, familiar with international law, knows that Dewey was compelled to leave Hongkong within twenty-four hours after hostilities had been declared between the two nations. He had nowhere to go except the enemy's country or to return home. But the memorable order from President McKinley to Dewey will live in the histor of the country: "Capture or destroy the Spanish fleet." This was the wise and only proper thing to do. Of course it landed us in the Philippines.

The American people did not want war, nor did President McKinley; but by outrageous conduct on the part of Spain in the treatment of her own subjects as well as the insult offered to this nation demanded a cessation of the brutal and inhuman conduct in Cuba. Soon after the capture of Manila Santiago fell. Spain sued for peace. A treaty of peace was signed at Paris and afterwards forwarded to the Senate for ratification or rejection. It was ratified and gave the United States sovereignty over the Philippines, which can not successfully be refuted. I ask permission to submit Article III of the treaty as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). If there be no objection, it will be incorporated in the Senator's remarks.

Article III is as follows:

ARTICLE III.

Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands, and comprehending the islands lying within the following line:

A line running from west to east along or near the twentieth parallel of north latitude, and through the middle of the navigable channel of Bachi, from the one hundred and eighteenth (118th) to the one hundred and twenty-seventh (127th) degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich, thence along the one hundred and twenty-seventh (127th) degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich to the parallel of four degrees and forty-five minutes (4° 45′) north latitude, thence along the parallel of four degrees and forty-five minutes (4° 45′) north latitude to its intersection with the meridian of longitude one hundred and nineteen degrees and thirty-five minutes (119° 35′) east of Greenwich, thence along the meridian of longitude one hundred and nineteen degrees and thirty-five minutes (119° 35′) east of Greenwich to the parallel of latitude seven degrees and forty minutes (7° 40′) north, thence along the parallel of latitude of seven degrees and forty minutes (7° 40′) north to its intersection with the one hundred and sixteenth (116th) degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich, thence by a direct line to the intersection of the tenth (10th) degree parallel of north latitude with the one hundred and eighteenth (118th) degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich, and thence along the one hundred and eighteenth (118th) degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich to the point of beginning.

The United States will pay to Spain the sum of twenty million dollars ($20,000,000) within three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

Mr. DEBOE. Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that Congress had a right to legislate for these islands. While we may differ and speculate as to how the court reached its decision and as to what it may do in the future in regard to these questions, it is a fact that we have a legal as well as a moral right there. The President had the same right to put down an insurrection in the Philippines that he would have had in New Mexico or Arizona. Who commenced the war or insurrection in the Philippines? Aguinaldo and his followers. But we hear it said that Dewey made him an ally of this country. He says he did not and he could not have done so, for the very fact he did not possess the power or right to do it. He made him no promises to that effect. I believe the great American admiral. Now, what caused Aguinaldo to feel unkindly toward our forces in the islands? We have been informed many times on the floor of this Senate and elsewhere that he and his men wanted to loot the city and take certain property. This was refused, which every honest man ought to approve.

When the city of Manila surrendered to Dewey and General Merritt, commanders of the navy and army at that time, there were hundreds of Spanish families, men, women, and children; families of Germans and English business men, as well as thousands of Spanish prisoners in the hands of our troops, all at the mercy of the Americans, as well as many other interests. The United States had assumed all responsibility for the protection of the people and all kinds of interest by reason of the capture of the city. Hence it was folly to think of exposing these people and their interests to such a body of men as was commanded by Aguinaldo. Then Aguinaldo organized a conspiracy against the American troops, and the story as to the treatment of our soldiers by Aguinaldo's men is well known. The facts as related by General Funston and other soldiers with whom I have talked are as follows:

The insurgents, with ribald jests, with curses and indecent oaths and insults, taunted us as cowards and dared our men to open fire, but stern discipline prevailed in our army, and we obeyed the instructions from General Otis to avoid a conflict under all circumstances or delay it as long as was possible, but day after day the friction became more intense. Nearly all of us, I think, realized that it was not a question of months, but a question of a few days until the clash must come.

Aguinaldo and his paper government, his cabinet, and his self-appointed congress retired to Malolos and there issued proclamations and sulked.

Finally, probably two weeks before the beginning of the war, an insurgent captain who refused to respond to the challenge of a sentry on the streets of Manila was shot dead. That was the first actual clash.

About three days after that a private soldier of the First Montana Regiment, who was on sentry duty outside of the city, was approached by a man with a rifle about 10 o'clock at night. He gave the usual challenge, but the man did not respond, but instead of that fired at him at a distance of a very few yards, but, Filipino-like, missed him.

Only two days later a private of the South Dakota Regiment on outpost, only 2 miles north of the city, was approached by an apparently unarmed native, who asked him for a match. The sentry started to hand him one, when he drew a bolo, a native knife about 2 feet long, and gave him a terrific blow across the face, cutting him from the top of the skull down to the chin, and I am glad to say that within half a second the native fell dead, shot through the heart.

A few days later a drunken mob of Filipinos, partly officers and partly soldiers of Aguinaldo's army, attempted to rush through the lines of the First Nebraska near Santa Casa. Only the presence of Colonel Sterns, that magnificent soldier who fell at Cang Co, prevented the fight from opening at that time. He had a great deal of influence over the natives and over his own men, and he induced them to retire.

Three days later an insurgent lieutenant and two soldiers approached a sentry on the Santa Lucia bridge, 3 miles east of Manila. The sentry, in accordance with orders that sentries usually have, challenged the three at once, and instead of halting the men gave him an insolent reply, came forward, started to cross his post, and he fired, and by one shot killed the lieutenant and one sodier.

The remaining soldier ran back to the insurgent line after this shot rang out and the First Nebraska was called out. Of course there was a great deal of excitement and everybody thought it was like the incident of the attempt to assassinate the sentry of the Montana regiment, which resulted in the shooting of the Filipino captain in Manila. We also thought that the thing was ended for the time being, but within a minute or two rifle fire broke out from the insurgent trenches in front of the First Nebraska Regiment, and war had begun.

Instantly, I have been told, skyrockets were fired into the air as a signal to make the attack, and the firing commenced all along the line of the insurgents.

This occurred about the time the treaty was ratified. Aguinaldo and his friends are responsible for all the bloodshed, the loss of all the lives of soldiers, all the suffering in those islands. He and his friends there and in this country are the ones to be denounced and not the American soldier.

The policy that has been followed there is the policy of President McKinley. When you denounce it you denounce him. When you say it is a violation of the Constitution of the United States then you brand him as disregarding the law. If the policy was wrong, then he was wrong. We are in favor of the principles of the Declaration of Independence—that all men are created free and equal; that all governments derive their just rights to govern from the consent of the governed, and wise and just laws should be had to ascertain this consent. I do not believe any man in this country was more fully in sympathy with these ideas than was our lamented President. It does seem to me that the policy pursued by President McKinley and indorsed by President Roosevelt was the wisest and the only true one to have pursued in these islands. We have heard much complaint of carpetbaggers in the Philippines.

It seems from all the evidence, taking it as a whole, that it would have been unwise to have intrusted the important work of establishing a Republican form of government for these people to men who knew but little of such a government. It would have resulted in nothing but failure and irretrievable ruin. I do not know where the President could have gone to have found men so thoroughly equipped in every particular for this great work as he did. At the head of the Commission he put one of the foremost citizens of the United States. No man who knew Judge Taft will question his ability or his honesty or integrity. The President expressed himself very clearly as to his policy in the Philippines, and indicated that his purpose was to give those people the absolute power in the future to hold offices and govern themselves locally. His instructions to the Taft Commission are worthy of the consideration of all right-thinking people. He explained fully what he desired to have the Commission do.

I submit the instructions of President McKinley, without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, they will be incorporated in the remarks of the Senator.

The instructions are as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 7, 1900.

SIR: In the message transmitted to the Congress on the 5th of December, 1899, I said, speaking of the Philippine Islands: "As long as the insurrection continues the military arm must necessarily be supreme. But there is no reason why steps should not be taken from time to time to inaugurate governments essentially popular in their form as fast as territory is held and controlled by our troops. To this end I am considering the advisability of the return of the Commission, or such of the members thereof as can be secured, to aid the existing authorities and facilitate this work throughout the islands."

To give effect to the intention thus expressed, I have appointed Hon. William H. Taft, of Ohio; Prof. Dean C. Worcester, of Michigan; Hon. Luke E. Wright, of Tennessee; Hon. Henry C. Ide, of Vermont, and Prof. Bernard Moses, of California, Commissioners to the Philippine Islands, to continue and perfect the work of organizing and establishing civil government already commenced by the military authorities, subject in all respects to any laws which Congress may hereafter enact.

The Commissioners named will meet and act as a board, and the Hon. William H. Taft is designated as president of the board. It is probable that the transfer of authority from military commanders to civil officers will be gradual and will occupy a considerable period. Its successful accomplishment and the maintenance of peace and order in the meantime will require the most perfect cooperation between the civil and military authorities in the islands, and both should be directed during the transition period by the same executive department. The Commission will therefore report to the Secretary of War, and all their actions will be subject to your approval and control.

You will instruct the Commission to proceed to the city of Manila, where they will make their principal office, and to communicate with the military governor of the Philippine Islands, whom you will at the same time direct to render to them every assistance within his power in the performance of their duties. Without hampering them by too specific instructions, they should in general be enjoined, after making themselves familiar with the conditions and needs of the country, to devote their attention in the first instance to the establishment of municipal governments in which the natives of the islands, both in the cities and in the rural communities, shall be afforded the opportunity to manage their own local affairs to the fullest extent of which they are capable, and subject to the least degree of supervision and control which a careful study of their capacities and observation of the workings of native control show to be consistent with the maintenance of law, order, and loyalty. The next subject in order of importance should be the organization of government in the larger administrative divisions, corresponding to counties, departments, or provinces, in which the common interests of many or several municipalities falling within the same tribal lines or the same natural geographical limits may best be subserved by a common administration. Whenever the Commission is of the opinion that the condition of affairs in the islands is such that the central administration may safely be transferred from military to civil control, they will report that conclusion to you, with their recommendations as to the form of central government to be established for the purpose of taking over the control.

Beginning with the 1st day of September, 1900, the authority to exercise, subject to my approval, through the Secretary of War, that part of the power of government in the Philippine Islands which is of a legislative nature is to be transferred from the military governor of the islands to this Commission, to be thereafter exercised by them in the place and stead of the military governor, under such rules and regulations as you shall prescribe, until the establishment of the civil central government for the islands contemplated in the last foregoing paragraph, or until Congress shall otherwise provide. Exercise of this legislative authority will include the making of rules and orders, having the effect of law, for the raising of revenue by taxes, customs duties, and imposts; the appropriation and expenditure of public funds of the islands; the establishment of an educational system throughout the islands; the establishment of a system to secure an efficient civil service; the organization and establishment of courts; the organization and establishment of municipal and departmental governments, and all other matters of a civil nature for which the military governor is now competent to provide by rules or orders of a legislative character.

The Commission will also have power, during the same period, to appoint to office such officers, under the judicial, educational, and civil-service systems, and in the municipal and departmental governments as shall be provided for. Until the complete transfer of control the military governor will remain the chief executive head of the government of the islands, and will exercise the executive authority now possessed by him and not herein expressly assigned to the Commission, subject, however, to the rules and orders enacted by the Commission in the exercise of the legislative powers conferred upon them. In the meantime the municipal and departmental governments will continue to report to the military governor, and be subject to his administrative supervision and control, under your direction, but that supervision and control will be confined within the narrowest limits consistent with the requirement that the powers of government in the municipalities and departments shall be honestly and effectively exercised and that law and order and individual freedom shall be maintained.

All legislative rules and orders, establishments of government, and appointments to office by the Commission will take effect immediately, or at such times as they shall designate, subject to your approval and action upon the coming in of the Commission's reports, which are to be made from time to time as their action is taken. Wherever civil governments are constituted under the direction of the Commission, such military posts, garrisons, and forces will be continued for the suppression of insurrection and brigandage and the maintenance of law and order as the military commander shall deem requisite, and the military forces shall be at all times subject under his orders to the call of the civil authorities for the maintenance of law and order and the enforcement of their authority. In the establishment of municipal governments the Commission will take as the basis of their work the governments established by the military governor under his order of August 8, 1899, and under the report of the board constituted by the military governor by his order of January 29, 1900, to formulate and report a plan of municipal government, of which his honor Cayetano Arellano, president of the audiencia, was chairman, and they will give to the conclusions of that board the weight and consideration which the high character and distinguished abilities of its members justify.

In the constitution of department or provincial governments they will give especial attention to the existing government of the island of Negros, constituted with the approval of the people of that island, under the order of the military governor of July 22, 1899, and after verifying, so far as may be practicable, the reports of the successful working of that government, they will be guided by the experience thus acquired, so far as it may be applicable to the conditions existing in other portions of the Philippines. They will avail themselves, to the fullest degree practicable, of the conclusions reached by the previous Commission to the Philippines.

In the distribution of powers among the governments organized by the Commission, the presumption is always to be in favor of the smaller subdivision, so that all the powers which can properly be exercised by the municipal government shall be vested in that government, and all the powers of a more general character which can be exercised by the departmental government shall be vested in that government, and so that in the governmental system which is the result of the process the central government of the islands, following the example of the distribution of the powers between the States and the National Government of the United States, shall have no direct administration except of matters of purely general concern, and shall have only such supervision and control over local governments as may be necessary to secure and enforce faithful and efficient administration by local officers.

The many different degrees of civilization and varieties of custom and capacity among the people of the different islands preclude very definite instruction as to the part which the people shall take in the selection of their own officers, but these general rules are to be observed: That in all cases the municipal officers who administer the local affairs of the people are to be selected by the people, and that wherever officers of more extended jurisdiction are to be selected in any way natives of the islands are to be preferred, and if they can be found competent and willing to perform the duties they are to receive the offices in preference to any others. It will be necessary to fill some offices for the present with Americans, which, after a time, may well be filled by natives of the islands. As soon as practicable a system for ascertaining the merit and fitness of candidates for civil offices should be put in force. An indispensable qualification for all offices and positions of trust and authority in the islands must be absolute and unconditional loyalty to the United States, and absolute and unhampered authority and power to remove and punish any officer deviating from that standard must at all times be retained in the hands of the central authority of the islands.

In all the forms of government and administrative provisions which they are authorized to prescribe, the Commission should bear in mind that the government which they are establishing is designed not for our satisfaction or for the expression of our theortical views, but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands, and the measures adopted should be made to conform to their customs, their habits, and even their prejudices, to the fullest extent consistent with the accomplishment of the indispensable requisites of just and effective government. At the same time the Commission should bear in mind, and the people of the islands should be made plainly to understand, that there are certain great principles of government which have been made the basis of our governmental system, which we deem essential to the rule of law and the maintenance of individual freedom, and of which they have, unfortunately, been denied the experience possessed by us; that there are also certain practical rules of government which we have found to be essential to the preservation of these great principles of liberty and law, and that these principles and these rules of government must be established and maintained in their islands for the sake of their liberty and happiness, however much they may conflict with the customs or laws of procedure with which they are familiar. It is evident that the most enlightened thought of the Philippine Islands fully appreciates the importance of these principles and rules, and they will inevitably within a short time command universal assent. Upon every division and branch of the government of the Philippines, therefore, must be imposed these inviolable rules:

That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense; that excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted; that no person shall be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense or be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; that the right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist except as a punishment for crime; that no bill or attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; that no law shall be passed abridging the freedom of speech or of the press or of the rights of the people to peaceably assemble and petition the government for a redress of grievances; that no law shall be made respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed.

It will be the duty of the Commission to make a thorough investigation into the titles of the large tracts of lands held or claimed by individuals or by religious orders; into the justice of the claims and complaints made against such landholders by the people of the island, or any part of the people, and to seek by wise and peaceable measures a just settlement of the controversies and redress of the wrongs which have caused strife and bloodshed in the past. In the performance of this duty the Commission is enjoined to see that no injustice is done; to have regard for substantial right and equity, disregarding technicalities so far as substantial right permits, and to observe the following rules: That the provision of the treaty of Paris pledging the United States to the protection of all rights of property in the islands, and as well the principle of our own Government, which prohibits the taking of private property without due process of law, shall not be violated; that the welfare of the people of the islands, which should be a paramount consideration, shall be attained consistently with this rule of property right; that if it becomes necessary for the public interest of the people of the island to dispose of claims to property which the Commission finds to be not lawfully acquired and held, disposition shall be made thereof by due legal procedure, in which there shall be full opportunity for fair and impartial hearing and judgment; that if the same public interests require the extinguishment of property rights lawfully acquired and held, due compensation shall be made out of the public treasury therefor; that no form of religion and no minister of religion shall be forced upon any community or upon any citizen of the island; that, upon the other hand, no minister of religion shall be interfered with or molested in following his calling, and that the separation between state and church shall be real, entire, and absolute.

It will be the duty of the Commission to promote and extend and, as they find occasion, to improve the system of education already inaugurated by the military authorities. In doing this they should regard as of first importance the extension of a system of primary education which shall be free to all, and which shall tend to fit the people for the duties of citizenship and for the ordinary avocations of a civilized community. This instruction should be given, in the first instance, in every part of the islands in the language of the people. In view of the great number of languages spoken by the different tribes, it is especially important to the prosperity of the islands that a common medium of communication may be established, and it is obviously desirable that this medium should be the English language. Especial attention should be at once given to affording full opportunity to all the people of the islands to acquire the use of the English language.

It may well be that the main changes which should be made in the system of taxation and in the body of the laws under which the people are governed, except such changes as have already been made by the military government, should be relegated to the civil government which is to be established under the auspices of the Commission. It will, however, be the duty of the Commission to inquire diligently as to whether there are any further changes which ought not to be delayed; and if so, they are authorized to make such changes, subject to your approval. In doing so they are to bear in mind that taxes which tend to penalize or repress industry and enterprise are to be avoided; that provisions for taxation should be simple, so that they may be understood by the people; that they should affect the fewest practicable subjects of taxation which will serve for the general distribution of the burden. The main body of the laws which regulate the rights and obligations of the people should be maintained with as little interference as possible. Changes made should be mainly in procedure and in the criminal laws to secure speedy and impartial trials and at the same time effective administration and respect for individual rights.

In dealing with the uncivilized tribes of the island the Commission should adopt the same course followed by Congress in permitting the tribes of our North American Indians to maintain their tribal organization and government, and under which many of those tribes are now living in peace and contentment, surrounded by a civilization to which they are unable or unwilling to conform. Such tribal governments should, however, be subjected to wise and firm regulation, and, without undue or petty interference, constant and active effort should be exercised to prevent barbarous practices and introduce civilized customs.

Upon all officers and employees of the United States, both civil and military, should be impressed a sense of the duty to observe not merely the material but the personal and social rights of the people of the islands and to treat them with the same courtesy and respect for their personal dignity which the people of the United States are accustomed to require from each other.

The articles of capitulation of the city of Manila on the 13th of August, 1898, concluded with these words:

"This city, its inhabitants, its churches and religious worship, its educational establishments, and its private property of all descriptions are placed under the special safeguard of the faith and honor of the American Army."

I believe that this pledge has been faithfully kept. As high and sacred an obligation rests upon the Government of the United States to give protection for property and life, civil and religious freedom, and wise, firm, and unselfish guidance in the paths of peace and prosperity to all the people of the Philippine Islands. I charge this Commission to labor for the full performance of this obligation, which concerns the honor and conscience of their country, in the firm hope that through their labors all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands may come to look back with gratitude to the day when God gave victory to American arms at Manila and set their land under the sovereignty and protection of the people of the United States.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

The SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DEBOE. Mr. President, a new nation has many serious and difficult problems to solve before it can successfully meet the best interest of those to be affected by legislation. Our Army is in the Philippine Archipelago by the direction of a majority of the American people through their representatives in Congress and the executive branch of the Government.

I have always had great faith in the American Army, and hope to never have an occasion to attack it as I have seen it done in this Senate. I never will condemn any officer or act of his before giving him a fair and impartial trial before a tribunal that will be actuated by the highest and purest motives and not by religious or political prejudice.

Mr. President, we all know the horrors of war. We all know that many cruel and wicked deeds are done during war times. We also know that in civil life many horrible crimes are committed. We have seen and fully realize that the passions of men often cause them to commit deeds of violence and bloodshed in moments of anger that nothing on earth could force them to do in the calm and deliberate reflections of life. I hate to hear of deeds of awful crime and brutality either in times of peace or war, but when we are called upon to sit in judgment on the conduct of our soldiers let us remember the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." Let us render judgment always tempered with mercy rather than prejudice. No doubt there have been punishments inflicted on individuals in the Philippines, caused by the conduct of the natives toward our soldiers, that were too severe. Orders have been issued that seem to us cruel and wrong, but let the whole facts be presented before any soldier or officer is condemned. There is not a Senator on the other side who is more opposed to inhuman treatment of men, women, and children than I am, but heaven forbid that I shall ever, in this Senate or elsewhere, traduce and denounce men for what seems harsh and cruel without full information and evidence of their guilt, especially men who have exposed themselves to shot and shell to save the life of the country that protects the lives and liberties of our countrymen.

If there had been, on the part of the opposition, the same energy and persistency to aid the Government and her soldiers, who are making great sacrifices for the cause of the people in the Philippines, as there has been to thwart and obstruct in many ways those who desire to relieve the situation, we might not have had so many massacres of our soldiers, such as burning them alive and the mutilation of their bodies in a horrible manner, or the burying of the wounded alive. Such atrocities as these and the brutal massacre of more than sixty odd of our soldiers while at breakfast at Balangiga, in Samar, and scores of others similar in brutality and barbarism, could not help arousing the feeling of their comrades, and they have done some things that I regret and disapprove. Mistreatment of prisoners or unwise orders of officers can not be condoned by anyone.

I truly believe that the utterances made in this country and circulated in the Philippines have done immense harm and created prejudice against the Americans and have prolonged hostilities. If these expressions of sympathy had been withheld, I verily believe that the archipelago would have been pacified to a much greater degree than it is. In all the criticisms I have heard, it seems to have been all on one side and against the American soldier and in favor of the Filipinos. When we examine the manner of the investigation on the part of the opposition it tinges of one-sided prosecution, without any attempt to reveal the wrongs and misdoings of the enemy of the United States. These criticisms call to mind the days of the Copperheads, who were too cowardly to meet the enemy, but sat safely in the rear and called to others to do so. The substitute of the opposition admits that we can not come away from the islands now, and that we ought to set up a stable government for those people.

The United States can not honorably withdraw from the archipelago and leave the country to the mercy of the Tagals under Aguinaldo. We are as much obligated to establish a stable form of government in those islands of the sea as we were to force Spain out of Cuba and establish a government there. Whenever the American people give orders for the withdrawal of the flag it will be done and not until then. The criticisms of Senators of the policy pursued there will have no influence in checking the friends of the Administrations of Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt in the faithful discharge of the obligations which they have assumed. The statements of Senators that the object of the Administration and its friends in the course pursued there is only exploitation and spoils is not true. The policy was inaugurated by McKinley, and no one will have the courage to make such accusation against him, who was universally honored and loved by the American people. It is the same policy to-day.

The paramount question is to give those people a form of government that will give them liberty such as is contemplated in the Declaration of Independence—liberty and freedom that will protect their lives, liberties, and property. Liberty and freedom that will not do this can not be called liberty and freedom. It would not be right to leave the government of the islands to the keeping of the Tagals under their leader, Aguinaldo. A tribe of about 2,000,000 people desires to govern all the other inhabitants, numbering nearly 8,000,000, who are opposed to Aguinaldo in the main. This seems to be the fact, as is shown by the evidence of American citizens of the highest class. From all the facts and evidence which I have examined the fear is not that we will refuse to give ample independence now, but that we may give them more than they are capable of rightfully receiving and thereby bring great harm instead of good to them.

The question as to the policy of giving the Filipinos an independent government is a question of great importance, and one that every Senator ought to fully appreciate, and I believe they do. I desire to refer to what Governor Taft says of this proposition. When asked in reference to the matter, he said:

> I think it is a question that I would not answer two or three generations before it will arise. I think the great evil of to-day is the discussion of something that is utterly impossible of settlement to-day. The thing the Philippine people need to-day is a stable government under the guidance of American control, teaching them what individual liberty is and training them to a knowledge of self-government, and when they have that the question of what relations shall then exist between the islands and this country may be settled between them and the citizens of the United States.
> But to attempt to decide in advance something that is utterly impossible wisely to decide now, it seems to me, with deference to those who differ with me, very unreasonable.

Mr. President, when we take into consideration the statement of Governor Taft, who has the confidence of all who know him, regardless of parties, who resigned a Federal judgeship in order to leave this country and go to the Philippines at the earnest request of President McKinley, and give his best efforts in trying to establish a wise, stable, and wholesome government for those people, and that, too, at great sacrifice both to health and finance, we should not treat it indifferently and without profound consideration.

The question of extending the Constitution of the United States to those islands is considered to be unwise by Governor Taft because the Filipinos are not ready for trial by jury. They have been educated in a different system of law, full of many defects, and not understanding our system of judicial proceedings. It would not be wise to extend the Constitution to those islands, for the people there do not want the right to bear arms, which the Constitution would give them the right to do, because this right would be most injurious to them. The Filipinos do not desire any such a right, as the evidence produced shows. It is claimed by some that one of the difficulties Spain had in dealing with these people was from the fact that she attempted to give them representation in the Cortes, and it proved a failure, working great harm to both Spain and the islands.

I see that some Senators are inclined to believe that this will be true of us if we give them any kind of representation without complete independence. But I can not concur in this belief, as this country has quite a different system of government from that of Spain. Then, I do not think a comparison can successfully be made between the two Governments in dealing with these people. We have already before us a comparson of the nations as to these people. For more than three hundred years Spain has tried to quiet and peacefully govern some of these people, and she utterly failed to subdue them, but in less than three years we see that the whole island is practically under control of the United States Government. True, there is some guerilla warfare in some sections, but we have every reason to believe that that will soon end.

We have heard our friends across the aisle many times most vehemently demanding that the Administration disclose its policy as to the Philippines. We heard the same demand made of President McKinley after he had, as I think, plainly and frankly stated in his message to the Fifty-sixth Congress, at its second session, what his views were. He said:

> In my last annual message I dwelt at some length upon the condition of affairs in the Philippines. While seeking to impress upon you the grave responsibility of the future government of those islands rests with the Congress of the United States, I abstained from recommending at that time a specific and final form of government for the territory actually held by the United States forces, and in which as long as insurrection continues the military arm must necessarily be supreme. I stated my purpose, until the Congress shall have made the formal expression of its will, to the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the statutes to uphold the sovereignty of the United States in those distant islands, or in all other places where our flag rightfully floats, placing to that end at the disposal of the Army and Navy all the means which the liberties of Congress and the people have provided. No contrary expression of the will of Congress having been made, I have steadfastly pursued the purpose so declared, employing the civil arm as well toward the accomplishment of pacification and the institution of local government within the lines of authority and law.

Mr. President, believing as I do, and as the evidence and facts show, that this insurrection in the Philippines was precipitated and begun by Aguinaldo and his followers; that they were not magnanimous enough to appreciate the fact that if it had not been for the action of this Government Spain would still rule them as she had in the past; that this Government had been their liberator, and was prepared to aid in giving them the same liberties and privileges, whenever they showed themselves capable of enjoying them, that each State and Territory in this Union enjoys. But instead of taking advantage of such blessings and being the friends of the United States, we have seen an attempt by a minority of these people to establish a dictatorial form of government to be ruled by one of their own members, and who had put to death one of the most intelligent generals of the other classes (General Luna) from the fact that Aguinaldo feared his popularity and that he would succeed him as dictator.

I refer to this incident not from a spirit of malice, but to illustrate the spirit which dominated the action of the insurgents and the folly of the United States in submitting to such a thing, and that, too, when the solemn responsibility rested upon her to see to it that the lives, property, and liberties of the people there were protected; that a wise and stable form of government was established. Instead of subjugating and making vassals of these people, as has been so frequently stated, the purpose of this Government is to elevate and civilize the Filipinos and give them, as far as possible, liberty and freedom that will protect them in all their God-given rights.

The truth is, all American citizens are solemnly bound and obligated, both legally and morally, to aid in the great work of bettering the condition of the inhabitants in the islands of the sea, which came to us by unavoidable events.

The responsibilities may seem arduous and difficult. We may become wearied and faint-hearted, the burden heavy to bear; nevertheless duty demands that justice and right prevail. It is useless to think of coming away from the Philippines in view of the facts that are now before us. Why, when we examine the proposition offered by the minority it brings no relief, remedies nothing, and leaves it worse than when we started. I repeat that the United States can not be forced to comply with the demands of the sympathizers of the insurgents and the friends of Aguinaldo. The charge that the Republican party ever changed policy in regard to the Philippines is not true. No one knew what was wisest and best to do, further than to accept the situation as we found it and do our duty in an effort in trying to solve the problem. The substitute of the minority is a confession that they are at sea and unable to successfully solve the vexed problem. McKinley never changed his policy, as has been charged on this floor. He adhered to what he believed to be his duty, just as President Roosevelt is doing and will continue to do, and there never will be a conditional surrender on the part of the United States at the dictation of any people while there is firing upon the Stars and Stripes. Peace will come quickly when Aguinaldo's sympathizers in any and all countries cease to make war on the American flag.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I am not myself now ready to go on with the debate, but I can say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the Senators on this side who are to participate in this debate will, I am quite sure, be ready by Monday to go on with a continuous debate. There are no Senators on this side who are prepared to make set speeches on the bill this afternoon, but after consultation with members of the minority, I am safe in saying that, commencing on Monday next, the debate will be continuous, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, and the Senators on this side who intend to debate the bill will be ready at any and all times.

I would suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Massachusetts, if it be agreeable to him, that, perhaps there is some other business on the Calendar that we might take up for the remainder of the afternoon. I want to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no disposition on this side to delay. We simply want to have the debate finished properly, and the Senators on this side who desire to speak given an opportunity to prepare themselves, and they are not prepared as yet.

I will further suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, in view of what I have said, that I think it will be an accommodation to this side, and will, perhaps, facilitate the reaching of a vote, if we adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like very much to have the Senate adjourn over until Monday, and I am very desirous to accommodate the Senators on the other side so far as I possibly can; but I do not feel justified in taking an adjournment over without any assurance whatever as to the time when the debate may close; I do not mean to fix a time. I do not feel justified in having the debate unduly protracted. On this side there are but three Senators who desire to speak on the bill so far as I am aware. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] told me that they desired to speak, and should be ready to proceed on Monday.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is the only other Senator on this side, so far as I know, who desires to speak, and I have made careful inquiries. Senators on the other side know pretty well what Senators on that side are going to speak against the bill. If I could have some general assurance as to when the debate might close—I do not propose to fix a time—I should be delighted to accommodate Senators on the other side. I do not want to be forced to press the bill continuously to the inconvenience of Senators; but I have a duty to perform to my own side and to other measures before the Senate; so, unless I can get some assurance in regard to the amount of time that the bill will still consume, I can not consent to an adjournment over to-morrow, which otherwise I should like to do.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is quite right. We think we know the Senators on this side who desire to speak on the question. I can say to the Senator, in addition to that, that we have in a measure arranged a programme, Senators on this side agreeing on the time when they are going to speak next week, and the programme, I think, includes all on this side who have expressed any desire whatever to debate the bill.

The debate has been more or less continuous, and I really think no time will be gained if we continue in session to-morrow. The Senator from Massachusetts knows perfectly well that there would be no difficulty in simply killing time until next week, if that was desired, and until our side is fully prepared and ready to debate the question; but we do not want to do that, and there has been no disposition on our part to do that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] has stated, I will say that it has been arranged that Tuesday of next week will be occupied by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I understand the Senator from Maryland, the present occupant of the chair [Mr. WELLINGTON], is to speak on Wednesday. There are several Senators on the Democratic side who have expressed a desire to speak, but who have not yet said positively that they will speak.

Mr. CULLOM. Only one speech a day?

Mr. PATTERSON. If there is any gap on any day we shall manage to fill up the gap; but it would not be fair, Mr. President, to our side of the Chamber to now agree to fix a time or to make a statement that would be absolutely binding. We ought, however, to be able by the latter part of next week to determine when general debate shall close. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. LODGE. It has been already said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] that Senators on the other side will be ready to debate the bill continuously after Monday of next week.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Can the Senator give me any assurance as to the other side? On Monday two Senators on this side will be prepared to speak.

Mr. DUBOIS. After consultation with leading Democratic Senators on this side who are not on the Philippine Committee, and after consultation amongst members of the minority, I think I am absolutely safe in saying, so far as our side is concerned, that commencing with next week we shall be ready for continuous debate. I do not like to speak for our side, and would not were it not for the fact that we have consulted quite a number of Senators of the minority. I think if there is any lapse in the arrangement, we should not hesitate a moment then to fix a time for voting.

Mr. LODGE. That is entirely satisfactory to me. I have the assurance of the Senator from Idaho that it is the intention of the opponents of this bill to debate it continuously. I have no desire to interfere with the debate progressing, but what I wish to avoid is wasting time day after day by breaking off early in the afternoon.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to state further that there are three or four Senators, who are in the minds of all of us, who intend to speak on this bill; but we can not tell how much time they will occupy, and therefore we are reluctant now to fix a time.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has told us when two Republican Senators will speak, and he has told us who they are. Will the Senator from Massachusetts inform us when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will speak?

Mr. LODGE. That I do not know, Mr. President.

Mr. DUBOIS. I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will close the debate with a splendid oration.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Wisconsin is a great disappearing gun. He generally rises when the consideration of a measure is about to end, and then he closes the debate.

Mr. SPOONER. I am content to have it closed, and I hope when I rise that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] will not disappear. I do not know why the Senator from Colorado should have referred to me. I intend to speak some time next week, if I am able to do so, but at what particular time I can not at this moment tell.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state why we wish to know when the Senator from Wisconsin intends to speak. All on our side are constantly predicting that the Senator from Wisconsin—and that is a great compliment to the Senator—is kept in reserve to fire the closing volley, raking this side of the Chamber fore and aft. [Laughter.] And this side of the Chamber would like, if it were possible, for the Senator just upon one single occasion not to occupy the floor until the minute for voting arrives.

Mr. SPOONER. When have I done that?

Mr. PATTERSON. Ever since I have been here; but that is not long.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think I have occupied the floor since you have been here nearly as much as you have. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not complaining of the length of time the Senator has occupied the floor, and I am not, indeed, complaining of anything. I am merely suggesting the tactical skill which the Senator from Wisconsin usually displays in debates of this kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think he ought to close the debate on this bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. Never for a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Or that his side should do so?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. You think so?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. SPOONER. My judgment is the other way. The Senator from Colorado says that I am kept in reserve. I will ask the Senator who has charge of this bill whether I am being kept in reserve or not? If so, I did not know it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not suppose that you have it in black and white, but that it is a tacit understanding.

Mr. SPOONER. I do intend to speak on the bill, but there is no tacit understanding at all; there is no understanding whatever on that subject. I should have been willing to have spoken this week if I had been able to do so. If I speak at all, I shall speak some time next week. I do not think I shall make any special effort to so arrange as to enable the minority to close the debate on this bill if I am the last speaker on this side. We take the responsibility on this side for the passage of the bill. We have the affirmative as to it, and the right to close the debate upon it. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has this measure in charge, has the right to close the debate.

I do not think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] need fret his soul at all about any traps, because I am quite certain there will be nothing of that kind.

When I spoke on the Philippine tariff bill I was obliged to wait for the members of the committee. I thought I had no right to enter the debate until the members of the committee had spoken. I do not owe to the Senator, nor, I think, to the Senate, any apology for speaking just when I did on that bill; but perhaps I owe an apology for speaking as long as I did. An examination of the debate, however, will show that part of that time the Senator from Colorado occupied the floor, and it was quite agreeable to me to have him do so, as it will be again.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the only difficulty about the matter is—and it is all a compliment to the Senator from Wisconsin—that he never occupies the floor a moment when the Senate is not deeply interested in him. I think, with one or two exceptions, he is the one Senator who can hold both sides of the Chamber in their seats even when the lunch hour arrives. After several experiences of the halo of glory in which the Senator from Wisconsin always closes his side of the debate—and that means closes the debate—there are some of us who would not like to suffer an eclipse of that kind too often. It is discouraging. Indeed, I am inclined to think that one reason of the reluctance of some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber to speak is the positive knowledge that the Senator from Wisconsin will follow them.

I do not suppose, Mr. President, that I can change the programme, whether it is expressed or implied, but, nevertheless, I think there is no harm in dropping a faint hint to the Senator from Wisconsin that regard for this side of the Chamber upon his part might induce him to forego the victory that is always awaiting his efforts at the close of a debate of this character. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I was not aware that I had been obstructing or rather prolonging this debate; but I should be very sorry indeed—and it is a very unique and anomalous suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado—to be in the attitude of absolutely prolonging this debate and delaying the passage of this bill an hour because of the assumption of the other side that I am to make a speech to which they will desire to reply.

I had supposed that the friends of this bill had the right to close the debate upon it; but perhaps I am wrong about that. I had not, however, expected to have assigned to me that function. I do not care to make a speech and never have made one here without reluctance; but since the Senator has so clearly intimated that my supposed participation in this debate is delaying the passage of this bill, I will propose to him that if his side will fix an early day for a vote on this bill I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to leave this debate.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is never so happy as when he is making an impossible proposition—a proposition impossible from two standpoints, first, because, much as this side of the Chamber fear the Senator from Wisconsin, they would not on any account miss the pleasure of one of his logical and impassioned speeches; and then for the additional reason that as a matter of course neither I nor any other member on this side has any authority to speak for the rest.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say in the outset that I have not been holding the Senator from Wisconsin in reserve or doing anything with him. He told me he wanted at some time in the debate to speak, and it is needless to say I was extremely glad to learn that he was willing to do so.

I have said with the utmost frankness that the speeches to be made on this side are to be made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. So far as I know or have had any notice, no one else is going to speak.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] assured me and assured the Senate when this discussion began, that the opponents of the bill would be ready to proceed continuously with the debate next week until the bill is disposed of, and in view of that assurance, as I am very anxious to accommodate Senators, as the Senator from Idaho knows, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. On Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, before that motion is put, I should like to make a statement. There is on the Calendar a very important bill relating to the interests of American shippers across the Atlantic, who are anxious to get relief from the conditions imposed upon them by a combination of owners of vessels plying on the North Atlantic, by reason of what is known as the "London landing clause." I wish the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The Chair understands, as it is presumed the Senator does, that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, and that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not debatable.

Mr. NELSON. I suppose the debate which has proceeded was by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. No; the other debate was not by unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to finish his statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think a motion to adjourn to a day certain is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will stand corrected if that be the case. His opinion was that it was not debatable.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to take occasion to correct myself on a question of order. I find that a motion to adjourn to a day fixed is not debatable under the twenty-second rule of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I sincerely trust the Senate will not adjourn over to-morrow. The measure to which I refer is an important bill. It has been on the Calendar for a long time. It affects all American shippers of American products to Europe. There is a combination among the steamship lines by which shippers have imposed upon them certain burdens. This bill has been reported from the Committee on Commerce and is on the Calendar. It affects a great many people. I trust the Senate will not adjourn over, but will agree to allow that bill to be considered to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his motion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know the bill to which the Senator refers is a very important measure. It will undoubtedly be taken up and disposed of. I think between now and adjournment we shall have ample time to consider it. I made this motion at the request of a great many Senators. The Senate has been sitting almost every Saturday, and a great many Senators have said to me that if it were possible, in justice to the pending business, to have an adjournment over Saturday they would be glad to have me make the motion. It was for that reason that I made the motion, and I do not feel, after having said to Senators on both sides that I would make the motion, that I can properly withdraw it.

Mr. NELSON. The consideration of the bill to-morrow will not interfere with the Philippine bill.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. NELSON. It will not delay in the least proceedings on that bill.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that. I did not mean to intimate that it would.

Mr, NELSON. I do not know of a time that could be better utilized in considering the bill than to-morrow. I think there will be Senators enough here to attend to the matter. I sincerely trust the Senate will not adjourn over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, concerning the bill to which the Senator from Minnesota calls attention, I will say that as a member of the Committee on Commerce I gave my consent that it should be reported, but two days ago I received a letter from a gentleman who represents interests of a good deal of importance in this country, calling my attention to some matters in the bill that he thought were objectionable. I have not had time to look into it carefully, and I think the Senator ought to let the bill go over until next week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate go to the Calendar.

Mr. DANIEL and Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. LODGE. I made the request forgetting that two Senators had spoken to me while the Philippine bill was pending, to whom I had said that at the earliest opportunity I would yield to them. I think I ought not to make a motion to go to the Calendar until those two Senators, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], have had an opportunity to make requests for unanimous consent which they told me, and have told me for several days, they desired to make.

EXTRA PAY TO CERTAIN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1694) to provide for compensation for certain employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy departments, in accordance with their recommendations, to pay certain permanent and temporary employees of their respective departments for work performed by them in excess of the regular working hours during the period of the war with Spain. It appropriates for that purpose for the Treasury Department, $3,176.02; for the War Department, $108,833.59; for the Navy Department, $42,447.56.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to add at the end of the bill the words:

And for the executive department, to pay the employees of the Executive office, $8,914.10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for compensation for certain employees of the Treasury, War, Navy, and executive departments."

Mr. DANIEL. I hold in my hand the estimate of the secretary to the President, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, which confirms the amendment. I ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

WHITE HOUSE, Washington, March 25, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to submit the following:

During the Spanish-American war nearly the full force of employees of the Executive Office were occupied on their official duties from 9 o'clock each morning until 1 o'clock the following morning, including Sundays. While the extra duties necessary during the first year of an administration are always anticipated and cheerfully performed, it would seem only just that in this extraordinary case Congress should make an appropriation in compensation for the services rendered by the clerical and messenger force in excess of the customary office hours.

Inclosed I send you detailed statements showing that on the basis of the actual extra service of each employee at the same rate per hour as his regular salary, from April 21, 1898, to January 31, 1899, $3,353.02 would be sufficient to compensate those on the Executive Office rolls; and $2,561.08 additional would provide for those detailed here at that time from Departments. The total amount necessary would be $8,914.10.

I therefore earnestly recommend that $8,914.10 be appropriated by the Congress for this purpose.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary to the President.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
United States Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. I also ask that the paper which I send to the desk, containing the various estimates of the Executive Departments, may be printed with the estimate of Secretary Cortelyou.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

The paper referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 18, 1901.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the bill (S. 1694) introduced by Senator MARTIN for Senator DANIEL, and now before your committee, "To provide compensation for certain employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," we, the clerks of the said Departments affected by the provisions of said bill, beg to submit the following statement in support of its passage by Congress:

The purpose of the bill is to compensate certain clerks of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments for their services rendered outside of regular office hours and on Sundays and holidays during the period of the Spanish war, owing to the exigencies of the war, and this compensation is requested in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

In order to meet the emergency of the war it became necessary for us to remain at our various posts for duty during many hours overtime, including Sundays and holidays, in cheerful and zealous compliance with orders from our respective Departments and the officers under whom we served; and many of us, in consequence of this constant and close application to service, not only sacrificed all private interests because of lack of time for attention to same, but also, on account of irregularity of meals, loss of sleep, etc., suffered injury to health, believing that our services thus willingly given were of value to the public service and therefore entitled to be appreciated.

We therefore respectfully suggest and petition and urge upon Congress that an appropriation be made as provided in the bill aforesaid for extra service at the same rate of pay as attaches to our respective positions, submitting the argument that such remuneration is justly due for services rendered with fidelity and with all disregard of personal interests, convenience, or welfare, at the most trying period of the year, when the excessive heat rendered the duty doubly burdensome.

CLERKS OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

On February 12, 1900, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury wrote the following letter to Congress:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 12, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the favorable consideration of Congress, communications from the Treasurer of the United States, the Register of the Treasury, and the chief of the division of loans and currency of this office, in regard to obtaining compensation for the employees in their respective offices for the extra services rendered by them in connection with the issue of the 3 per cent loan of 1898, under the provisions of the act of June 13, 1898, said services having been rendered after the hours of 5 p. m. and on Sundays and holidays.

The amount required to be appropriated to meet such extra compensation is $8,176.02, as follows:

Office of Treasurer of the United States	$2,705.59
Office of Register of the Treasury	2,489.75
Division of loans and currency, Office of Secretary	2,980.68

Respectfully,

O. L. SPAULDING, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The foregoing is printed in House Document No. 423, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.

CLERKS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

During the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress the then Secretary of War, Hon. Russell A. Alger, under date of January 11, 1899, transmitted to Congress petitions of clerks of his Department for compensation for their extra services as aforesaid, and made the following recommendation (see House Doc. No. 138, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session):

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 11, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith petitions from civilian employees in the offices of the Surgeon-General and the Quartermaster-General of the Army, praying that they be granted compensation for the work performed by them in excess of the regular working hours during the war with Spain, said petitions being strongly recommended by the Surgeon-General and the Quartermaster-General, as appears from their respective indorsements thereon.

These petitions apply to only two of the bureaus, although the statements therein presented are applicable alike to other bureaus and offices of this Department.

Section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1898, prescribes the hours of labor for clerks and other employees in the Executive Departments, and provides:

"That the heads of the Departments may, by special order, stating the reason, further extend the hours of any clerk or employee in their Departments, respectively; but in the case of an extension it shall be without additional compensation."

The fact that the law referred to establishes the hours of labor would seem to justify the belief that it was not the intention of Congress that the prescribed hours should be permanently or indefinitely extended without additional compensation, but that the provision was designed to meet any sudden or temporary emergency that might arise. The conditions created by the war with Spain rendered it necessary that the clerks and other employees should work, regardless of hours, in order to the performance of the immense amount of clerical work devolved upon the Department, and consequently they have worked by night as well as by day, including Sundays and legal holidays.

With a spirit of cheerfulness they responded to every demand made upon them and labored with industry and zeal, sacrificing health, comfort, and personal convenience to the performance of duty. Under these circumstances it seems to be a measure of justice that these employees should be compensated for the excessive and arduous services thus rendered, and I therefore earnestly recommend that provision be made by Congress whereby they may receive just compensation for such services during the period from May 1 to December 31, 1898.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On February 20, 1899, during the same session of Congress, the Secretary of War transmitted to Congress the following estimates of amounts necessary to pay the regular and temporary employees of the various bureaus and divisions of his Department (see House Doc. No. 248, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session):

Secretary's Office	$14,101.69
Quartermaster-General's Office	31,440.34
Inspector-General's Office	2,173.55
Adjutant-General's Office	22,319.94
Army Headquarters	1,898.96
Commissary-General's Office	5,972.52
Surgeon-General's Office	15,357.48
Judge-Advocate-General's Office	132.02
Office Chief of Engineers	3,874.88
Office Chief of Ordnance	2,933.47
Signal Office	1,109.08
Paymaster-General's Office	6,814.76
Paymaster-General's Office (Major Baird's employees)	704.90
Total	108,833.59

In forwarding the above estimates the Secretary of War again made the following strong recommendation for the compensation:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations, statements showing in detail the number of days' service rendered by the employees of the several bureaus and offices of this Department in excess of the regular working hours and the amount that would be required to pay for such services should Congress decide to make provision for that purpose.

These statements represent an appeal by the employees for compensation for their extra work, and in thus submitting the matter to Congress I deem it not improper to state that were it an appeal simply to a spirit of liberality for the grant of a gratuity I should feel inclined to withhold my commendation, but believing it to be based upon justice, it commands my recommendation to favorable consideration.

Since the commencement of the war with Spain these employees have worked early and late, regardless of hours, including Sundays and holidays, with a zeal and fidelity deserving of the highest commendation. The extra services thus rendered were needed by the Government in order to meet the demands imposed upon the Department by the conditions of war, the Government thus becoming the beneficiary. As a consequence of the severe strain thus imposed upon the employees, the health of many of them has become impaired, necessitating expense of medical treatment, while all have sacrificed much personal comfort and convenience.

It therefore seems to be only just that the employees who have rendered such faithful and valuable daily services to the Government in excess of the regularly established office hours should be compensated therefor, and I accordingly earnestly recommend that an item may be inserted in the pending deficiency appropriation bill making an appropriation of the amount necessary for that purpose.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

At the following session of Congress, Fifth-sixth, first session, the then Secretary of War, Hon. Elihu Root, added his recommendation to those of his predecessor, as follows (see House Doc. No. 482, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session):

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 1, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith for transmission to Congress detailed statement showing the number of days' service rendered by the employees borne upon the regular rolls of the War Department and its bureaus and offices in excess of the regular day's labor of seven hours each from April 21, 1898, to January 31, 1899, and the total amount required to reimburse the employees for such service should Congress decide to make provision for that purpose.

In submitting this estimate of appropriation it is proper to state that I should not feel inclined to forward the same if it were not believed to be a matter of simple justice to a class of employees who have rendered great service to the Government.

Since the beginning of the war with Spain, and up to the present time, the clerks of the War Department have labored early and late, and with a zeal and fidelity to the interests of the Government worthy of the highest consideration. Such established privileges as the customary leave of absence, usually granted by the heads of the Departments, and the periodical respite from labor incident to Sundays and legal holidays, were quite generally dispensed with in the effort to meet the immense pressure of business brought on by the war. Some clerks have died and the health of many has been impaired in direct consequence, it is thought, of the severe strain incident to the continuous and responsible service rendered under trying circumstances and unfavorable conditions. The extra duty was performed by these employees cheerfully and efficiently when greatly needed to meet the demands of war, and it does not seem appropriate that the Government should accept the same as a gratuity from the employees of the War Department, many of whom are poorly paid in comparison to those employed elsewhere in the departmental service.

This measure was inaugurated by my predecessor, a copy of whose letter, addressed to Congress at its last session, is herewith inclosed. There are numerous precedents for such action, a list of which is also herewith inclosed, and it will prove but an act of justice to faithful public servants, who, in my opinion, are fully entitled to the favorable consideration of Congress in this respect. The measure commands my favorable consideration and hearty approval.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The former recommendation of Secretary Alger followed, and is in the same document (House Doc. No. 482, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session).

The same document also contains a list of precedents where compensation for extra services has been paid to Government employees.

CLERKS OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

In the Navy Department no account was kept of the extra hours during which war-time services were rendered in the various bureaus, except in the Navigation Bureau. On March 28, 1900, Secretary Long wrote the following letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, recommending that the Navy Department employees be compensated for their extra services, and recommending one month's extra pay as the form of compensation.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 28, 1900.

SIR: In view of the fact that recommendations have been made by the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury and the honorable the Secretary of War for an appropriation to pay the employees in those Departments for services rendered in excess of office hours between January 1, 1898, and June 30, 1899, by reason of the increase of work due to the war with Spain, I have the honor to ask, in case these recommendations are favorably considered, that the same consideration be extended to employees of the Navy Department who have rendered like services. The Bureau of Navigation has prepared an estimate with reference to employees of that Bureau which I inclose, and I have authorized the other bureaus to furnish estimates also for similar transmission.

It has occurred to me that if this form of remuneration should not meet the approval of your committee, it would be proper to consider whether or not the same plan might be adopted that is sometimes adopted with reference to employees in the Senate and House of Representatives; that is, to make an appropriation for paying an extra month's or more months' salary.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

With this recommendation was inclosed the statement of overtime furnished by the Bureau of Navigation, showing the extra services of its employees, with an estimate of the amount required to pay for the same, and also letters from all the other bureaus of the Department stating that no account had been kept of the extra time, and that one month's extra pay would be a satisfactory remuneration for the services of their respective employees.

Since the date of the above letter of the Secretary of the Navy, the employees of the Navigation Bureau have signified their willingness to accept compensation for their services on the same basis as agreed to by the other bureaus of the Navy Department, to wit, to be paid one month's extra pay as full compensation, and the bureaus are now uniform in their requests for that method of remuneration.

The Secretary of the Navy, under date of November 25, 1901, in response to a request from Hon. WILLIAM. M. STEWART, of the Senate Committee on Claims, asking for an estimate of the amount required to pay the Navy Department employees, wrote the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, November 25, 1901.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 8th instant, in which you refer to the suggestion made by this Department, in its letter to the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, March 28, 1900, relative to compensation of employees in this Department for services rendered in excess of office hours between January 1, 1898, and June 30, 1899, and request to be furnished with an estimate for the use of the Committee on Claims, showing the aggregate amount required for each bureau to pay one month's extra pay to the employees who may be entitled to extra compensation, I have the honor to inform you that it is estimated that the following amounts will be required under each bureau and office of the Navy Department for the purpose mentioned, viz:

Office of Secretary of Navy (omitting Secretary and Assistant Secretary)	$3,402.02
Bureau of Yards and Docks	914.24
Bureau of Equipment	1,216.88
Bureau of Navigation	2,865.98
Bureau of Ordnance	1,767.80
Bureau of Construction and Repair	7,988.40
Bureau of Steam Engineering	3,694.32
Bureau of Supplies and Accounts	5,031.60
Bureau of Medicine and Surgery	953.72
Office of Judge-Advocate-General	1,039.96
Office of Naval War Records	1,318.80
Library, Navy Department	219.80
Hydrographic Office	7,759.40
Naval Observatory	3,191.60
Nautical Almanac Office	1,354.00
Office of Naval Intelligence	339.04
Total	42,447.56

Referring to the bill you propose to introduce at the coming session of Congress, providing for the payment of these extra war-time services of the employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments jointly, the following is suggested for incorporation therein in order to make an equitable distribution:

All clerks who have been employed during the entire period, January 1, 1898, to June 30, 1899, shall be allowed one month's extra pay. Those employed for a shorter period shall have one-eighteenth of a month's pay for each month or fraction of a month employed during said period.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. WM. M. STEWART,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The total amount of the Secretary's estimate, to wit, $42,447.56, will carry out his recommendation and will pay all of the employees of his Department entitled to this compensation the amount recommended by the Secretary.

It will be seen from the foregoing statements that the amounts required to carry out the provisions of S. 1694 and to provide compensation for the extra services of the certain employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments are as follows:

Treasury Department	$8,176.02
War Department	108,833.59
Navy Department	42,447.56
Total amount	159,457.17

A balance of the national defense appropriation ($50,000,000) remaining unexpended at the close of the war was covered into the Treasury. The amount of this balance is understood to be more than $1,000,000. It will be seen, therefore, that only a small amount of this balance would be required to carry out the provisions of S. 1694, and this amount could be readily reappropriated.

At the last session of Congress an amendment to the general deficiency bill, providing for payment for the services of the War Department employees rendered during the Spanish war, was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Claims and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but no action was taken by the Senate upon the amendment.

The day's labor for Government employees in the Departments is fixed by law at seven hours, to wit, from 9 o'clock a. m. to 4 o'clock p. m. We respectfully submit that the labor, inconvenience, hardships, and additional expense attending the extra work referred to constitute strong claims for extra compensation, and, as stated in the recommendation of Secretary Alger, "the fact that the law establishes the hours of labor would seem to justify the belief that it was not the intention of Congress that the prescribed hours should be permanently or indefinitely extended without additional compensation."

The policy of Congress in connection with extra work performed by Government employees is shown in the following joint resolution, approved February 25, 1899, providing for the payment to certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics at United States navy-yards and stations of 50 per cent additional pay for work performed in excess of their regular hours:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay 50 per cent additional for all work in excess of eight hours per diem performed by laborers, workmen, and mechanics, whose compensation is fixed upon a basis of eight hours per diem, and who, between March 18, 1898, and October 31, 1898, were employed at any United States navy-yard or naval station, and who worked in excess of eight hours per day and have not already received said additional compensation; the amount due each laborer, workman, and mechanic affected by the above to be based upon the time records of the several bureaus at the navy-yard or naval station where the work was performed."

This 50 per cent granted to the navy-yard employees was additional pay (they having already been paid the regular rates for every extra hour's work done), and was for extra work performed during the Spanish war, in the same manner as the extra work performed by the employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy departments, for which compensation is now asked.

The compensation provided for in the bill under consideration is not at a greater rate than regular pay such as was paid the navy-yard employees and recognized by Congress as just and proper for extra work, but is merely pay at the regular rates for the extra time during which services were rendered.

Respectfully submitted.

THE EMPLOYEES OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
THE EMPLOYEES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT, and THE EMPLOYEES OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Who rendered extra services during the period of the war with Spain.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2162) to increase the efficiency and change the name of the United States Marine-Hospital Service.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the United States Marine-Hospital Service shall hereafter be known and designated as the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, and the Supervising Surgeon-General and the officers now or hereafter commissioned under the act of January 4, 1889, entitled "An act to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States," and acts amendatory thereof, shall hereafter be known as the Surgeon-General, surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and assistant surgeons of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States. Nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to discharge or affect as to salary, except as hereinafter provided, the officers above named, the acting assistant surgeons, pharmacists, and other employees of the Marine-Hospital Service, or to deprive any officer of his commission or the benefits derived by longevity of service. The care of sick and disabled seamen and all other duties now required by law to be performed by the Marine-Hospital Service shall hereafter be performed by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and all funds and appropriations now provided by law for use by the Marine-Hospital Service and all properties and rights pertaining to said service shall be available for use for like purposes and in like manner, under the Treasury Department, by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

SEC. 2. That the salary of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall be $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That commissioned medical officers, when detailed by the Surgeon-General for duty in the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Bureau at Washington, D. C., in charge of the administrative divisions thereof, namely, marine hospitals and relief, domestic quarantine, foreign and insular quarantine, personnel and accounts, sanitary reports and statistics, and scientific research, shall, while thus serving, be assistant surgeons-general of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, but their pay and allowances shall be the same as now provided by regulations of the Marine-Hospital Service for officers in charge of said divisions; and the senior officer thus serving shall be the assistant within the meaning of section 178, Revised Statutes of the United States: Provided, however, That no such officer shall be detailed in charge of said divisions who is below the rank of passed assistant surgeon.

SEC. 4. That the President is authorized, in his discretion, to utilize the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in times of threatened or actual war to such extent and in such manner as shall in his judgment promote the public interest without, however, in any wise impairing the efficiency of the service for the purposes for which the same was created and is maintained.

SEC. 5. That there shall be an advisory board for the hygienic laboratory provided by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, for consultation with the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service relative to the investigations to be inaugurated, and the methods of conducting the same, in said laboratory. Said board shall consist of three competent experts, to be detailed from the Army, the Navy, and the Bureau of Animal Industry by the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the Secretary of Agriculture, respectively, which experts, with director of the said laboratory, shall be ex officio members of the board, and serve without additional compensation. Five other members of said board shall be appointed by the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be skilled in laboratory work in its relation to the public health, and not in the regular employment of the Government. The said five members shall each receive compensation of $10 per diem while serving in conference, as aforesaid, together with allowance for actual and necessary traveling expenses and hotel expenses while in conference. Said conference is not to exceed ten days in any one fiscal year. The term of service of the five members of said board, not in the regular employment of the Government, first appointed shall be so arranged that one of said members shall retire each year, the subsequent appointments to be for a period of five years. Appointments to fill vacancies occurring in a manner other than as above provided shall be made for the unexpired term of the member whose place has become vacant.

SEC. 6. That there shall be appointed by the Surgeon-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General, commissioned medical officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service are not available for this duty by detail, competent persons to take charge of the divisions, respectively, of chemistry, zoology, and pharmacology of the hygienic laboratory, who shall each receive such pay as shall be fixed by the Surgeon-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The director of the said laboratory shall be an officer detailed from the corps of commissioned medical officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, as now provided by regulations for said detail from the Marine-Hospital Service, and while thus serving shall have the pay and emoluments of a surgeon: Provided, That all commissioned officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service not below the grade of passed assistant surgeon shall be eligible to assignment to duty in charge of the said divisions of the hygienic laboratory, and while serving in such capacity shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of their rank.

SEC. 7. That when, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, the interests of the public health would be promoted by a conference of said service with State or Territorial boards of health, quarantine authorities, or State health officers, the District of Columbia included, he may invite as many of said health and quarantine authorities as he deems necessary or proper to send delegates, not more than one from each State or Territory and the District of Columbia, to said conference: Provided, That an annual conference of the health authorities of all the States and Territories and the District of Columbia shall be called, each of said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to be entitled to one delegate: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the said Surgeon-General to call a conference upon the application of not less than five State or Territorial boards of health, quarantine authorities, or State health officers, each of said boards or quarantine authorities joining in such request to be represented by one delegate.

SEC. 8. That to secure uniformity in the registration of mortality, morbidity, and vital statistics it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, after the annual conference provided for in section 7, to prepare and distribute suitable and necessary forms for the collection and compilation of such statistics, and said statistics, when transmitted to the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Bureau on said forms, shall be compiled and published by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service as a part of the health reports published by said service.

SEC. 9. That the President shall from time to time prescribe rules for the conduct of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. He shall also prescribe regulations respecting its internal administration and discipline, and the uniforms of its officers and employees. It shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General to transmit annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission by said Secretary to Congress, a full and complete report of the transactions of said service, including a detailed statement of receipts and disbursements.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT MONOMOY ISLAND, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4995) to establish an additional life-saving station on Monomoy Island, Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN EIGHTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5316) providing for an additional circuit judge in the eighth judicial circuit.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I have two short letters from two of the judges of that circuit which I desire to have printed in the RECORD for the information of the House, when the bill shall go there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
St. Paul, Minn., May 6, 1902.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the inclosed letter of Judge Sanborn, I will say that I concur in what he has said relative to the amount of work in this circuit. There is certainly enough work in the eighth circuit to employ the time of four circuit judges in addition to the present force of district judges. I think, however, that we would obtain a greater measure of relief in this circuit by a division of the circuit upon reasonable lines than by the appointment of an additional circuit judge. If the circuit is not to be divided, I should favor the appointment of an additional circuit judge.

Very respectfully, AMOS M. THAYER.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
St. Paul, Minn., May 6, 1902.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I notice that you have introduced in the Senate a bill for an additional circuit judge in the eighth circuit and that a bill has passed allowing an additional circuit judge in the second circuit. This, the eighth circuit, comprises 11 States—North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Kansas, Missouri, and Arkansas—and to it are attached three Territories for certain judicial purposes—the Indian Territory, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. The appeals and writs of error from 14 district judges and from the supreme court of the Indian Territory come to the court of appeals of this circuit for hearing. They are numerous, and they present every conceivable question of law and of fact. The circuit is constantly increasing in population, in wealth, and in business in the Federal courts. The work of the appellate court absorbs all of the time and energy of the present circuit judges, and more. A district judge is necessarily called upon the bench of the court of appeals many times to assist in performing its work. Another circuit judge would be of great assistance to us in the court of appeals, and would enable one of the circuit judges to spend a portion of his time in the hearing of cases in the circuit courts of the various States, a course of action which, in my judgment, would be of great benefit to the litigants in these courts.

In view of this situation and of the fact that an additional circuit judge has been granted to the second circuit, I submit for your consideration the following facts:

In 1900 the population of the eighth circuit, including the three Territories attached to it for judicial purposes, was	13,553,600
The population of the second (the New York circuit) was	8,520,955
The population of the first (the Boston circuit) was	4,339,956
The population of the third circuit was	5,370,519

No circuit has a population within 2,000,000 of that of the eighth circuit.

2. The number of cases docketed in the various courts of appeals for the following circuits during the two years ending June 30, 1901, was—

In the eighth circuit	342
In the second circuit	347
In the first circuit	93
In the fourth circuit	95
In the third circuit	133
In the fifth circuit	245
In the sixth circuit	246
In the seventh circuit (Chicago circuit)	185
In the ninth circuit (California circuit)	168

3. The number of cases disposed of by the various circuit courts of appeals during these two years was:

Eighth circuit	356
Second circuit (New York circuit)	334
Sixth circuit	261
Fifth circuit	221
Seventh circuit	194
Ninth circuit	168
Third circuit	132
First circuit	97
Fourth circuit	91

4. The number of opinions which have been written by the various courts of appeals from the organization of the courts, March 3, 1891, to February 9, 1900, and the number of pages of opinions as they appear in the Circuit Courts of Appeals Reports, volumes 1 to 36, are:

Circuit.	Number of opinions.	Pages of opinions.
Eighth circuit	1,317	3,981
Second circuit	1,121	1,903
Third circuit	647	3,219
Sixth circuit	792	2,107
Seventh circuit	617	1,928
Ninth circuit	556	1,873
Third circuit	362	823
Fourth circuit	335	1,077
First circuit	308	703

These statistics seem to demonstrate the fact that if there is any circuit in the country that is entitled to the assistance of an additional circuit judge it is the eighth circuit to-day, while the facts can not be denied that it has the largest area and that the business in the Federal courts is increasing and will in the future increase more rapidly in this circuit than in any other circuit in the Union.

Very respectfully, yours, WALTER H. SANBORN.

GEORGE P. WHITE.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5079) for the relief of George P. White.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to release Capt. George P. White, Ninth United States Cavalry, from all liability resulting from the loss of $4,299.76 cents, the unrecovered balance of stolen quartermaster funds for which he was responsible, the sum now being charged against him on the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I send to the desk and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a brief letter from the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 26, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of the 10th ultimo, relative to the relief of Capt. George P. White, Ninth United States Cavalry, in the sum of $4,299.76 charged against him on the books of the Treasury, representing the unrecovered balance of stolen quartermaster's funds for which he is responsible, I beg to inform you that the Quartermaster-General of the Army recommends that as Captain White was in no way to blame for the loss of this money he be relieved from responsibility in the sum above named, and states that he would favorably regard any Congressional legislation which may suggest itself to you as most fitting and likely to secure the desired relief for this officer.

Very respectfully, WM. CARY SANGER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. J. P. DOLLIVER,
United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may now proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills and bills to correct records of soldiers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills and bills to correct records of soldiers. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment for the purpose of making a request to have certain papers printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the orders of General Bell, which appear on pages 7 and 8 of Senate Document No. 347, may be printed in the RECORD, they not having been printed in the RECORD, and also that the two reports from civil governors in the Philippines, which appear in the hearings before the Committee on the Philippines, at pages 2336 and 2344, be also printed in the RECORD. These two reports from civil governors appear to have been in the possession of Governor Taft, judging from their dates, when he testified before the Committee on the Philippines, but he did not present them to the committee until a few days ago.

I ask that these two reports, together with the orders of General Bell dated December 8 and 9, 1901, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators have heard the request of the Senator from Texas. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The papers referred to are as follows:

TELEGRAPHIC CIRCULARS ISSUED BY BRIG. GEN. J. F. BELL TO STATION COMMANDERS IN THE PROVINCES OF TAYABAS, BATANGAS, AND LAGUNA.

[Telegraphic circular No. 2.]

BATANGAS, December 8, 1901.

To all Station Commanders:

In order to put an end to enforced contributions now levied by insurgents upon the inhabitants of sparsely settled and outlying barrios and districts by means of intimidation and assassination, commanding officers of all towns now existing in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna, including those at which no garrison is stationed at present, will immediately specify and establish plainly marked limits surrounding each town bounding a zone within which it may be practicable with an average-sized garrison to exercise efficient supervision over and furnish protection to inhabitants (who desire to be peaceful) against the depredations of armed insurgents. These limits may include the barrios which exist sufficiently near the town to be given protection and supervision by the garrison, and should include some ground on which live stock could graze, but so situated that it can be patrolled and watched. All ungarrisoned towns will be garrisoned as soon as troops become available.

Commanding officers will also see that orders are at once given and distributed to all the inhabitants within the jurisdiction of towns over which they exercise supervision, informing them of the danger of remaining outside of these limits, and that unless they move by December 25 from outlying barrios and districts with all their movable food supplies, including rice, palay, chickens, live stock, etc., to within the limits of the zone established at their own or nearest town, their property (found outside of said zone at said date) will become liable to confiscation or destruction. The people will be permitted to move houses from outlying districts should they desire to do so, or to construct temporary shelter for themselves on any vacant land without compensation to the owner, and no owner will be permitted to deprive them of the privilege of doing so.

In the discretion of commanding officers the prices of necessities of existence may also be regulated in the interest of those thus seeking protection.

As soon as peaceful conditions have been reestablished in the brigade these persons will be encouraged to return to their homes and such assistance be rendered them as may be found practicable.

J. F. BELL,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

[Telegraphic circular No. 3.]

BATANGAS, December 9, 1901.

To all Station Commanders:

A general conviction, which the brigade commander shares, appears to exist that the insurrection in this brigade continues because the greater part of the people, especially the wealthy ones, pretend to desire but in reality do not want peace. That when all really want peace we can have it promptly. Under such circumstances it is clearly indicated that a policy should be adopted that will as soon as possible make the people want peace, and want it badly.

It is an inevitable consequence of war that the innocent must generally suffer with the guilty, for when inflicting merited punishment upon a guilty class it is unfortunately at times impossible to avoid the doing of damage to some who do not individually deserve it. Military necessity frequently precludes the possibility of making discriminations. This is regrettable, but it should be borne in mind that the greatest good to the greatest number can best be brought about by putting a prompt end to insurrection. A short and severe war creates in the aggregate less loss and suffering than benevolent war indefinitely prolonged. For reasons here indicated, which are well known to all, and chief of which is the delay and difficulty in ascertaining the exact truth, it will be impossible to wage war efficiently and at the same time do abstract justice in operations unquestionably essential to putting down an insurrection which has long continued in the territory of this brigade.

Natural and commendable sympathy for suffering and loss and for those with whom friendly relations may have been maintained should therefore take a place subordinate to the doing of whatever may be necessary to bring a people who have not as yet felt the distressing effect of war to a realizing sense of the advantages of peace.

War in the disturbed portions of this brigade, and when manifestly necessary in those portions supposed to be peaceful or which are under civil government, will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of General Orders, No. 100, Adjutant-General's Office, 1863, which publishes instructions for the government of the armies of the United States in the field. The provisions of this order will be directly adhered to, but no station commander will put anyone to death as a measure of retaliation for assassination under sections 27, 28, 34, and 148 without obtaining authority from a superior commander, nor will the death penalty be inflicted in any case without similar authority. General Orders, No. 100, is now being reprinted at division headquarters, and when copies are received they will be distributed. Particular attention is invited to the last paragraph of section 52, in particular reference to possible repetitions of the Balangiga affair.

Commanding officers are urged and enjoined to use their discretion freely in adopting any or all measures of warfare authorized by this order which will contribute, in their judgment, toward enforcing the policy or accomplishing the purpose above announced.

It is not necessary to seek or wait for authority from these headquarters to do anything or take any action which will contribute to the end in view. It is desired that subdistrict commanders accord to their subordinate officers and commanders a degree of confidence and latitude in operations similar to that herein conferred upon them. Such restraint and supervision only should be exercised as is dictated by sound discretion, and as may be essential to securing concert of action and cooperation when desirable, adherence to authorized methods, and a uniform policy and harmonious action in working for a common end. Subordinate commanders and young officers of experience should not be restrained or discouraged without excellent reason, but should be encouraged to hunt for, pursue, and vigorously operate against armed bodies of insurgents wherever they may be found. Considering the comparative morale of our troops and insurgents, and the lack of reliable ammunition and training on the part of the latter, it is not believed there exists any just cause for exceptional caution or apprehension in attacking them boldly. At any rate, under present conditions, legitimate chances should be accepted, as excessive caution will do us incalculable harm. Except when the advantage in position and numbers is overwhelming on the side of the enemy, our troops should always assume the offensive and advance on and pursue them vigorously. The best defense against these people is to assume a vigorous offensive at once. To retire in the presence of this enemy is generally hazardous and discouraging to our troops.

Nothing herein contained will be so interpreted as to warrant or excuse carelessness or a lack of well-known and proper precautions. Though troops should be aggressive, they should be military in methods, and precautions against surprise and ambush should never be neglected.

In addition to maintaining active operations against armed bands of insurgents, persistent and systematic efforts will be made through the use of spies, loyal police, native scouts, intelligence officers, provost-marshals, and provost courts to discover, apprehend, and punish all agents, collectors, organizers, contributors, and sympathizers who secretly aid, assist, and extend encouragement or comfort to those in arms. Many such persons will unquestionably be found among municipal officials and councils and tenientes or cabezas of barrios.

It is so probable as to amount almost to a certainty that the election of all town officials in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna have been dictated by Malvar or other insurgent leaders, and that they would never have been permitted to discharge their functions without molestation had they not continued to be subservient to the will of the insurgent leaders and been acting as their agents, or at least have done nothing inconsistent with their interests. It is perfectly safe and easy for town councils to enact the most violent legislation against the insurrection, and sending copies thereof to the insurgent leaders to secretly inform them that the legislation was enacted under compulsion of Americans or in order to deceive and lull them to sleep, but that the town officials propose to continue their aid of the insurrection secretly, just as heretofore.

It can be adopted, as a rule, without danger of error that whenever an insurgent sympathizer writes a letter, or takes any action under pretense of opposition to the insurrection, that he will immediately secretly convey to insurgent officials the information that he was compelled to do or did so to mislead Americans. The loyalty of persons should not be judged by such acts or words alone, nor should the public enactments of councils in favor of peace and against insurrection be accepted as conclusive proof of the loyalty of town officials.

The only acceptable and convincing evidence of the real sentiments of either individuals or town councils should be such acts publicly performed as must inevitably commit them irrevocably to the side of Americans by arousing the animosity and opposition of the insurgent element. Such acts are reliable evidence, but mere words are worthless. No person should be given credit for loyalty simply because he takes the oath of allegiance or secretly conveys to Americans worthless information and idle rumors which result in nothing. Those who publicly guide our troops to the camps of the enemy, who publicly identify insurgents, who accompany troops in operations against the enemy, who denounce and assist in arresting the secret enemies of the Government, who publicly obtain and bring reliable and valuable information to commanding officers, those, in fact, who publicly array themselves against the insurgents and for Americans, should be trusted and given credit for loyalty, but no others. No person should be given credit for loyalty solely on account of his having done nothing for or against us so far as known. Neutrality should not be tolerated. Every inhabitant of this brigade should either be an active friend or be classed as an enemy.

Presidentes and chiefs of police against whom sufficient evidence can be found to convict them before a court of violating their oaths by acting as agents for insurgents, or by aiding, assisting, or protecting them in any way, should be arrested and confined, and should ordinarily be tried by military commission. Charges should be preferred and forwarded with that in view. Other town officials guilty of similar offenses might be tried by provost courts unless their offense be too grave for adequate punishment thereby.

Another dangerous class of enemies are wealthy sympathizers and contributors, who, though holding no official positions, use all their influence in support of the insurrection, and while enjoying American protection for themselves, their families, and property, secretly aid, protect, and contribute to insurgents. Chief and most important among this class of disloyal persons are native priests. It may be considered as practically certain that every native priest in the provinces of Batangas and La Laguna is a secret enemy of the Government and in active sympathy with the insurgents. These are absolutely our most dangerous enemies—more dangerous even than armed insurgents—because of their unqualified influence. They should be given no exemptions whatever on account of their calling. On the contrary, whenever sufficient evidence is obtainable they should be brought to trial. Should well-founded suspicion rest against them in the absence of competent evidence, they should be confined and held as a necessary military precaution to preclude further activity or bad influence on their part.

The same course should be pursued with all of this class, for to arrest anyone believed to be guilty of giving aid or assistance to the insurrection in any way, or of giving food or comfort to the enemies of the Government it is not necessary to wait for sufficient evidence to lead to conviction by a court, but those strongly suspected of complicity with the insurrection may be arrested and confined as a military necessity, and may be held indefinitely as prisoners of war, in the discretion of the station commander or until the receipt of other orders from higher authority. It will frequently be found impossible to obtain any evidence against persons of influence as long as they are at liberty, but once confined evidence is easily obtainable.

The apprehension and punishment of one individual of the above-mentioned classes (men of wealth and standing, and officials) is of greater importance and will exercise greater influence than the punishment of a hundred ignorant hombres for whose suffering no principale cares a straw. The wealthy and influential and town and insurgent officials are therefore those against whom our most energetic efforts should be directed. The common people amount to nothing. They are merely densely ignorant tools, who blindly follow the lead of the principales. When guilty, they must be arrested and confined in order to put an end to further activity on their part, but whenever it is possible to reach their chief or leader through their testimony they may be promised immunity from trial for such simple offenses as aiding and assisting or being insurgents. They should not be released, however, unless they are willing to demonstrate their loyalty by public participation in operations against their former leaders.

The policy herein indicated need not be applied should commanding officers be convinced it is inadvisable in those portions of the brigade where peaceful conditions have been completely reestablished, as in Marinduque, for example. Discretion should be exercised as to the degree of rigor to be employed in its enforcement in those portions of the brigade where civil government exists and where no organized insurrection or intrigue is discoverable.

Provost courts can not operate in the provinces of Cavite and Tayabas, but any disloyal person escaping from Batangas or Laguna into other provinces of the brigade may be there arrested by the military authorities and be sent back for trial by military courts in the province from which they escaped. Insurgents or armed ladrones residing in Cavite or Tayabas and operating across the line in Batangas or Laguna, or other persons living in Cavite or Tayabas who furnish aid or assist the insurgents in any way, or who engage in insurrectionary intrigues or operations, will be arrested and reported to these headquarters for further instructions. Any station in Batangas or Laguna at which a provost court does not now exist will be reported and an officer recommended as such.

Wherever the constabulary have been organized cordial cooperation will be extended to and solicited from them. Commanding officers will promptly transmit by wire to other commanding officers any information which may possibly be of assistance to them, and are expected to seek cooperation and concert of action from each other whenever such may appear to be desirable.

REPORT OF J. H. GRANT, PROVINCIAL GOVERNOR OF LEYTE, ON EXISTING CONDITIONS IN HIS PROVINCE, TOGETHER WITH EXHIBITS ACCOMPANYING SAME.

PROVINCE OF LEYTE, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Tacloban, October 26, 1901.

A. W. FERGUSSON,
Executive Secretary, Manila, P. I.

SIR: In view of the recent occurrences in this province and our proximity to the island of Samar, where there is so much military activity just now, which necessarily affects the administration of civil government here, I deem it my duty to make a brief report of existing conditions in this province for the information of the civil governor.

Unfortunately for the peace and tranquillity of the people of this province, the military authorities here have sustained a severe fright since the Balangiga affair, and have done many things that are calculated to hinder the progress of civil government and make the people inquire what benefits they are to derive from civil government. I will mention the most important of these in this report:

Immediately after the receipt of the news of the massacre at Balangiga the military authorities began patrolling the town from about 8 o'clock p. m. until the next morning, challenging and arresting everyone who could not satisfy the patrol that they were good men. On the night of September 30 a sentry shot and instantly killed a man who did not hear, or at least did not heed, his challenge. Of course the people do not understand why these things should take place under civil government. I inclose correspondence covering this incident, marked "A."

Following this, on the afternoon of the 9th instant, orders were sent out from district headquarters direct to the presidente, so he says, to arrest and take to the tribunal every man in Tacloban who came from Samar. The result was that 150 men were rounded up, without warrant or other process, and subjected to some kind of an investigation, which, being incompleted at a late hour at night, quite a number of them were confined until next morning, when the investigation proceeded and all of them were then given their liberty except six. I inclose correspondence covering this incident also, together with a list of the names of those arrested.

I have given the presidente to understand that he must, in future, submit all such orders to me before he acts on them. You can imagine the excitement such a wholesale rounding up would create, and rumors of deportations and hangings were in the mouths of every little group of people on the street corners.

Following this came the order that no boats except steamers could pass through the straits in either direction. This order, while it is perhaps a wise one from some points of view, is unfortunate, as it necessarily entails suffering on the inhabitants of the straits, northern Leyte; and Biliran towns, since they are dependent upon Tacloban and Carigara for supplies, and to a certain extent lessens their appreciation of civil government. I wish to say in this connection that I have had application from nearly all of the presidentes in the above-mentioned territory, asking for troops or guns to protect themselves against the insurgents of Samar, which requests have been transmitted to the military, pending the organization of the insular constabulary, and I believe if they had been furnished protection that they would have resisted the demands of the Samar people; but with not a gun or revolver in their town, it was equivalent to being held up by highwaymen when armed insurgents came into the town and made demand for food and money.

I particularly regret the arrest of the presidente of Babatungon, for I believe he is an excellent man, and he told me he was afraid the insurgents would murder the town officials and burn the town if they were not furnished protection.

I inclose herewith a list of the names of the people recently arrested by order of the department commander. They are now in confinement at Carigara as military prisoners.

The commanding officer in Tanauan recently issued an order to the effect that the people there could not hold a certain church festival unless they agreed not to have the procession beyond the church plaza. I was appealed to and forwarded a communication to the department commander requesting that the commanding officer at Tanauan be instructed to permit the people to hold their festivals according to their customs, but have not yet received a reply. In the meantime I informed the presidente of my action, and assured him that he would be permitted to celebrate the feast without interference, but there was so much pressure brought to bear on him that he postponed the celebration of the feast until the 8th of December. I inclose copy of letter covering this.

I am informed that a detachment from Tanauan recently fired into a party of laborers from Dagami, killing one and wounding two, according to military reports, but I think there were more men wounded. This happened in the daytime, and the soldiers were commanded by an officer, and from all the information obtainable was purely a case of nervousness on the part of the officer in charge. I am having an investigation made.

I am just in receipt of the election returns from Malitbog, which show that Lieutenant Macklin acted as chairman of the election judges in the election recently held there for municipal officers. I inclose correspondence covering same.

I inclose correspondence between Lieutenant Conger, aid to General Hughes, and myself, which is self-explanatory.

I also inclose copy of telegraphic report of Lieutenant Macklin, and letter from Lieutenant Adams, explaining the cause of the arrest of the presidente of Hinundayan and the presidente and vice-presidente of Villaba.

I am satisfied that these men were actually aiding the insurgents while holding office under the civil government, and I have already requested information, in a former communication, as to what court has jurisdiction in these and similar cases.

I herewith inclose copy of order, No. 28, in reference to people passing between the two islands, which I have caused to be communicated to the presidentes of the towns, with the request that it be published in each town.

I desire to say in conclusion that there has not been the slightest friction between the civil and military authorities here, and that our relations are perfectly friendly, but I can not permit such acts as I have enumerated to pass unnoticed, and I have asked for explanations in order to lay the facts before the civil governor, realizing that the adjustment of such questions should be referred to the heads of the respective departments. I will say, however, that it is the opinion of every insular and provincial officer here that with the aid of the constabulary this province is able and ready to maintain civil government, unaided by the military.

I mail under separate cover recommendations of the provincial presidentes, who met in Tacloban on the 21st instant, with the action of the provincial board on the same.

Respectfully submitted.

J. H. GRANT, Governor.

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, PROVINCE OF LEYTE,
Tacloban, December 14, 1901.

Gen. LUKE E. WRIGHT,
Acting Civil Governor, Manila.

MY DEAR GENERAL: In explanation of my telegram informing you of the removal of troops from certain towns in this province I take the liberty of writing you a personal letter as to the actual conditions in Leyte and my explanation as to the cause of their withdrawal.

I desire to preface this explanation with the statement that I have cooperated with General Smith in every measure he has adopted, in order that he might not be handicapped in prosecuting to a successful termination his campaign in Samar.

Some of his measures I have thought wholly unnecessary and somewhat prejudicial to the best interests of the people of this province, but have refrained from protesting because of the reasons above assigned and in obedience to your instructions to have no conflict with the military.

So our relations, both socially and officially, have been of the most pleasant nature. Only last Monday evening he and General Breckinridge and their personal staffs were my guests to dinner, and on the following day Mrs. Grant and myself were General Smith's guests aboard his launch on a trip to show General Breckinridge San Juanico Straits.

In view of these facts, you can imagine my surprise when I received information on Monday last to the effect that on Saturday previous troops had been withdrawn from Jaro, Alangalang, Dagami, Palo, and Barugo; that the telegraph instruments had been taken from Palo and telephones from Barugo and Dagami, thus cutting off communication with Tacloban. I immediately went up to see General Smith to find out if the information was correct and to find out if troops were to be withdrawn from any other towns. He referred me to the adjutant-general, who confirmed the report and informed me that troops were under orders to leave Malitbog, Cabalian, Hinunangan, and Carigara. I urged him not to take troops from Malitbog, Cabalian, and Hinunangan, and suggested that they be withdrawn from Dulag and Tanauan instead, and was then informed that within a very short time they would be withdrawn from these towns also, as they were needed in Samar.

I then requested that the troops in the towns in the southern part of the province be left until the last, as that was where Capili and his band were operating. He regretted that it could not be done, because the general did not care to change commanding officers at the point in Samar where he desired reenforcements, and that Lieutenant Macklin at Malitbog was the only commander in Leyte junior to this officer, so he had been selected. I then wired the senior constabulary officer at Bato to place 20 men in Malitbog and return to Tacloban with the remainder of his detachment in order to occupy the towns vacated. He arrived here on the 13th, after having placed a detachment in Malitbog, and all the vacated towns have now been occupied.

Up to the 7th instant the total strength of the constabulary in Leyte was about 70, but on that date 60 were mustered in, so they have about 125 men now, but the 60 just received require instruction and training.

Now as to conditions in this province: I consider them somewhat better than they were when I arrived here; certainly no worse. From all information obtainable Capili and his band, whose armed force I have never heard estimated as consisting of over 40 guns and a few bolomen, and frequently much less, are the only people who are still in the mountains and with whom we have to deal.

If he has as many guns as he is reputed to have, they must be in very bad condition. He must have no ammunition or he is very inactive, since I do not know of a single man who has been killed by firearms in this province since I have been here, and but one town having been fired on, and only a few shots then. Since General Smith has been in command here there has not been a single surrender of arms or men, nor has there been a single capture to my knowledge. The only thing he has accomplished, to my knowledge, was the arrest of a few men on Biliran and along the straits, on the confession of one of Lukban's officers, the truth of whose statements is yet to be established.

So, General, all the sensational newspaper reports that have reached Manila from reporters traveling with General Smith are absolutely without foundation, and have had but one object in view, the return of this province to military control.

I say this because I know he made a request to that effect, and he read me an extract from General Chaffee's reply, which said in substance, "It is not desirable to return Leyte to military control," assigning his reasons therefor, but concluded by saying, "The governor of Leyte must be called on to demonstrate his ability, and if he can't do it, then I will make a formal request to have Leyte returned to handle the situation to military control."

In the light of this statement the withdrawal of these troops and the manner in which it was done lead to but one conclusion, which I do not think it necessary for me to mention. They were left absolutely without protection, and all my available constabularly was out in the mountains at least a hundred miles away, while I was not even notified.

This conclusion is made all the more irresistible by a statement made to the inspector of customs this morning by General Smith to the effect that he was not trying to drive the civil officers out; that he wanted them to stay and continue to draw their salaries, but he wanted them to say, "Here, Smith, you run it."

I am interested in the welfare of the people of this province and in the successful solution of the problem out here, and I place these above my personal ambition, and I do not care to see people in this province go backward when there is no necessity for it.

There have been a lot of abuses committed by the soldiers in this province, if rumors are true, and Inspector Borseth has just spoken to me of some very striking ones that have been committed around Matalom, which I have instructed him to investigate and swear out warrants if he secures conclusive evidence.

I really think it would be beneficial, just as soon as the constabulary is organized and the municipal police in certain towns can be armed, to withdraw the troops from the province, with the exception of an emergency force at Tacloban. I feel confident that the constabulary can handle the situation.

I inclose copies of correspondence between General Smith and myself relative to the withdrawal of these troops, and I trust that my action in the matter will meet with your approval.

I sincerely trust that the health of Governor Taft continues to improve, and that he will soon be entirely well again.

With kindest regards to yourself and Mrs. Wright, I am,

Very sincerely,

J. H. GRANT, Governor.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming if the bill he calls up does not take much time.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for his courtesy. It is a very short bill which I wish to have passed and it is highly necessary to certain interests that it should be passed at once.

I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4617) to authorize a resurvey of certain lands in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to know from the Senator in charge of the bill what is the particular necessity for the Government to have this work done. It is done continually all over the country by individuals.

Mr. WARREN. It is because the Government has not yet done its proper work of survey. This refers to a part of the public domain which the Government had supposed was surveyed, but it seems that under some old deposit system the survey was erroneous or fraudulent. The country is filling up with settlers; there is constant friction between them because of faulty or no surveys, and the Government, to protect its own interest, asks for the passage of this bill, the draft of which was furnished me by the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Washington, if his bill will not result in debate.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4204) relating to grants of land to the Territory and State of Washington for school purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 11, after the word "selected," to insert "when the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the section read:

That in all cases where sections 16 and 36, or either or any of them, or any portion thereof, have been occupied by actual settlers prior to survey thereof, and the county commissioners of the counties in which said sections so occupied as aforesaid are situated, have, under said act of Congress of March 2, 1853, located or selected other lands in sections or fractional sections, as the case may be, within their respective counties, in lieu of said section so occupied as aforesaid, the lands so located or selected, when the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be deemed and taken to have been granted to said State by said act of February 22, 1889, and said lands so selected and located are hereby granted to the said State of Washington, and the title of said State thereto is hereby confirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 12, after the word "appropriated," to insert "when the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That where any lands appropriated by Congress to said Territory to compensate deficiencies for school purposes, where sections 16 or 36 were fractional in quantity, or where one or both were wanting by reason of the township being fractional, or from any natural cause whatever, or where section 16 or 36 were patented by preemptors, have been selected and appropriated as provided in said act of Congress of February 26, 1859, the lands so selected and appropriated, when the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be deemed and taken to have been granted to said State of Washington by the said act of February 22, 1889, and said lands so selected and appropriated are hereby granted to said State, and the title thereto confirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BARD. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1908) to authorize the establishment of a biological station on the Great Lakes under the control of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to establish a biological station on the Great Lakes at some appropriate point in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, or Minnesota to be selected by him. For the purpose of conducting an investigation as to the most suitable site for such station, and for acquiring by lease, purchase, or otherwise the necessary land and water rights for the erection of such buildings, wharves, and other structures as may in future be necessary for the proper equipment of the station, $10,000 is appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the words "late unassigned recruit" in line 7. I did not know that the Committee on Pensions was in the habit of recommending the pensioning of unassigned recruits, and I ask for a reading of the House report to show that these words ought not to be in the bill, because they are misleading. Let that part of the House report be read giving the military record of the soldier.

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC LANDS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13244) authorizing the President to reserve public lands and buildings in the island of Porto Rico for public uses, and granting other public lands and buildings to the government of Porto Rico.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to make, within one year after the approval of this act, such reservation of public lands and buildings belonging to the United States in the island of Porto Rico, for military, naval, light-house, marine-hospital, and other public purposes, as he may deem necessary, and all the public lands and buildings, not including harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of water, owned by the United States in said island and not so reserved be, and the same are hereby, granted to the government of Porto Rico, to be held or disposed of for the use and benefit of the people of said island: Provided, That said grant is upon the express condition that the government of Porto Rico, by proper authority, release to the United States any interest or claim it may have in or upon the lands or buildings reserved by the President under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if this is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was reported from the committee by unanimous vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Indiana explain the object of this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the situation in relation to this measure is this: At the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Paris there were public lands in the island of Porto Rico amounting to about 104,000 acres, lands mainly in the interior of the island, away from railroads and highways, lands of a mixed character, some of them classed as brush lands, some as mountainous, and some as swamp lands. Considerable portions of the lands are capable of reclamation, and will make a fair quality of farming land. In addition to this, on the island of San Juan, on which the city of San Juan is located, there are about 150 acres of public lands which are badly needed for municipal purposes, but the title is in such condition that they can not be utilized.

There is a pressing necessity for such disposition of the land on the island of San Juan that such portions of it as are not needed for public use may be used for the extension of the city. There is not a single vacant lot in the city of San Juan in private ownership to-day. A large portion of that island is held by the public, and is not needed nor being used for any public purpose.

The law does not confer upon the Secretary of the Interior any authority over the public lands in the island at all. In his report this last year he recommended that some supervision or control be given him; that he be authorized to survey and classify the lands, and in pursuance of that recommendation early in the session I introduced a bill putting the control of the lands under the Secretary of the Interior and directing him to survey and classify them and proceed to reclaim the possession of those that were held by occupants without right and to protect the title thereto. On investigation it was thought by the Committee on Insular Affairs, in view of the character of the land, that it would be unwise to put them under the control of the Secretary of the Interior; that the cost of survey and classification would be more than would ever be realized from their sale.

The governor of Porto Rico was communicated with by the Secretary of the Interior, and he sent the commissioner of public works here to represent the interests of the people of the islands. The commissioner made a statement before the Committee on Insular Affairs, and, after a full hearing and a careful investigation of the question, the committee decided that it was not the policy of this Government to appropriate to its own use any of the public lands in Porto Rico, but that the revenues of the lands ought to be given to the people of the island; and the judgment of the committee was that all the lands not needed for public purposes should be granted to the insular government, to be held or disposed of for the benefit of the people of the island.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to call the attention, in this connection, of the gentleman to the fact that we have a commissioner from Porto Rico, who ought to be on the floor of the House now, from whom we might inquire as to the situation, but is denied the privilege of the floor, and who has to stay around in the corridors. I would like to get his views about this bill. Of course, as a commissioner he could not make a speech, but there is a resolution now pending allowing him to come on the floor to look after the legislation he is interested in, and in that connection I only call the attention of the Chair to this difficulty. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the commissioner has been consulted about this bill; whether it meets his approval.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am glad to be able to say to the gentleman from Iowa that the commissioner from the island of Porto Rico appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs and made a full historical statement in relation to the title and the condition of the public lands in the island, and he took the position that the title was, in equity, in the province of Porto Rico at the time of the cession of that island to the United States, and therefore never passed to the United States Government under the treaty of Paris.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to inquire of my friend from Indiana as to whether a considerable portion of this public land is not now in the occupation of squatters—settlers—and whether any arrangement has been made to protect the rights of those men, who have perhaps been occupying this land for generations?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is impossible to say how much of the public lands of Porto Rico may be occupied now by what are known as squatters, because no one knows the boundaries, the extent, and the exact location, and no one knows how many of the old Spanish land grants have been forfeited and how many men are asserting titles that are unfounded.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a still further question, if he does not think there should be some provision under this bill that will protect the rights of these long-time native settlers there?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We concluded that that authority could safely be vested in the government of the island. They are on the ground and know the situation, and will be required to undergo the expense necessary for the reclamation, the surveying of the land, and the perfecting of the titles, and we thought it entirely safe to vest in the insular government the power to take care of the equitable rights of the squatters.

Now, there is another aspect of this question that I beg to call to the attention of the House, and that is the question of title. The inhabitants of the island of Porto Rico insist that away back in 1808, at the time the Spanish Government changed from an absolute monarchy into a constitutional government and established an independent treasury for the province of Porto Rico, in effect, though not expressly, the Crown of Spain yielded and ceded all of the public lands in the island to the provincial government, and that the Government of Spain never attempted to exercise any authority over the lands from that time until the American conquest.

Now, it was the judgment of the committee that by authorizing the President of the United States to reserve all of the land on the island that he might deem necessary for military posts, for naval stations, and for other public purposes, within a year after the date of the passage of the act, and ceding the balance of the lands to the island, to be held for the benefit of the people, all the questions of ownership and title would be satisfactorily disposed of. For the protection of this Government we require as a condition to the operation of our grant that the insular government shall release to the United States any claim it may have upon the lands or the buildings that the President shall reserve under the authority conferred upon him by the terms of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does this bill now cede any rights we may have over that land to the people of Porto Rico or the government of the Territory of Porto Rico, or does it merely authorize the President to make the selections? Is that as far as you go in this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill authorizes the President to reserve such public lands as he may deem necessary for military, naval, marine hospital, and other public purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And goes no further than that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And then it expressly grants all the other public lands—all the lands not so reserved—to the government of Porto Rico, to be held or disposed of for the benefit of the people of the island, on condition that they release to the United States any claim they may have upon the lands reserved by the President under the provisions of the act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did the Insular Committee, when this bill was before it, consider the question of leaving the public lands there open to homestead entry in the future?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, sir. That question was discussed by the committee; but in view of the fact that there are only about 104,000 acres of land—generally of a mountainous character—and in view of the large expense that might be entailed, we thought it wise to remit the whole question to the insular government. We concluded that it could perhaps handle the question and dispose of it in a way more satisfactory to the interests of all concerned than we could do, because of our limited knowledge of the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the unanimous conclusion of the Committee on Insular Affairs?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was; and it is the unanimous judgment of the committee that this bill ought to pass at once—that there is a pressing necessity for its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I move that House bill 5823, for which the bill just passed was substituted, lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

ROAD TO NATIONAL CEMETERY, DOVER, TENN.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 89) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $11,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing, under the direction of the Secretary of War, a macadamized road, or a road partly of gravel and partly of stone, from the river landing or its vicinity, in the town of Dover, Tenn., to the national cemetery near Old Fort Donaldson: Provided, That the right of way, not less than 50 feet in width, shall first be secured to the United States to any part of the ground over which said road shall run not now owned by the United States.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REFUND OF TAXES ON LEGACIES, ETC.

Mr. McCALL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 13204) was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the corporations, associations, or societies, such sums of money as have been paid by them as taxes upon bequests or legacies for uses of a religious, literary, charitable, or educational character, or for the encouragement of art, or legacies or bequests to societies for the prevention of cruelty to children, under the provisions of section 29 of the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1898.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Ways and Means were read, as follows:

In line 3, after the word "Treasury," insert "under appropriate rules and regulations to be prescribed by him."

In line 6 strike out the word "or."

In line 6, after the word "societies," insert "or individuals as trustees or executors."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, this bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that committee, after considering it, thought it a wise bill to be reported. While the war-revenue act would bear the construction that taxes should be imposed on legacies to hospitals, schools, libraries, and the charities of the country generally, yet I think I venture nothing in saying that there was no man in either House who contemplated that result from that act. The taxes imposed under that act were not merely the amount imposed in cases where the legacy was left to a brother or equally near relative, but in cases where the property passed to persons remote in blood, and to strangers in blood. That is to say, the highest tax was imposed upon charitable legacies, amounting in some cases, I think, to 15 per cent.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue furnished to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a statement of the various legacies on which this tax had been paid, and if any gentleman will look at this list he will have a very good general view of the charitable and educational work of the country.

Let me say further, as bearing upon our intention, that the very first thing repealed when we dealt with the war-revenue act was this taxation upon legacies to charitable and religious institutions and other institutions of that kind.

I have included in the report which I have made in this case on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means a list of the taxes which have been paid, embracing such institutions as the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, of California, the Berkeley Divinity School, of Connecticut, the Home for Aged Sisters of the Poor, of Connecticut, the colleges and city libraries, the lying-in hospitals, charitable eye and ear infirmaries, homes for aged men, homes for aged women, etc. This tax we levied remorselessly upon those institutions which it has always been the policy of our laws to spare.

Mr. CLAYTON. Has not the Commissioner of Internal Revenue held that this tax would be against the estate of the deceased person and not against the legatee?

Mr. McCALL. The tax was imposed upon the legacies, and in many cases it came out of the legatees.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did not the Commissioner make some ruling of that sort?

Mr. McCALL. He could not make such a ruling, because the tax was imposed upon the legacies. In some cases, I will say, the executors or trustees sustained a portion of the tax, but it was recouped from the legacies; in a great majority of cases it was paid from the legacies. I called that matter to the attention of the committee, and after considering it we thought it wise to refund all of the taxes, no matter whether they were paid by individuals or by whom, upon these charitable legacies. We did not believe it was the intention of the Government of the United States to go down into the contribution boxes of the country. We though tthat that money burned in the National Treasury and that the vindication of our national character required that it should be refunded. And while there was a difference of opinion in the committee as to some amendments, as I understand it, the committee were unanimously in favor of reporting the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. This measure met the unanimous approval and judgment of the Committee on Ways and Means, did it?

Mr. McCALL. As I understand it, the committee were unanimously for it. As I said, one gentleman suggested a certain amendment which was not thought wise to be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It was the unanimous action of the committee. They were all in favor of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am entirely satisfied with the explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCALL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LAND GRANTS TO NEW MEXICO.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11062) to amend an act entitled "An act to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of an act approved June 21, 1898, entitled "An act to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes," is amended by adding at the end of the said section the following:

"Provided, That timbered lands may be sold in tracts of not to exceed 25,000 acres to any one person, corporation, or association of persons."

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands, was read:

In line 8 strike out all after the word "Provided" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That timber upon land referred to in this section be sold, in tracts not to exceed 25,000 acres to any one person, corporation, or association, for the highest and best price obtainable, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of public lands or the legislative assembly of said Territory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KLEBERG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. On last Monday, May 12, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], in his remarks on what was called the gas bill, made use of the following language:

It—

That is, the bill—

was carefully considered. Every man on that committee knew all about it, and my friend from Missouri and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will join me in saying that for three months they have stayed out of church and Sunday school to hunt up villainous objections to this proposition, that they ought not to find fault with, or less fault with, because we have taken this matter up and asked for prompt consideration.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let me make just this suggestion: If there is anything on earth that would justify a man in staying away from Sunday school and church it would be to fight such a bill as this. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. I know my friend abhors a corporation.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. JENKINS. And I appreciate it. I know he is absolutely afraid of everything that has corporate qualities, but yet when I invited him in a previous Congress to put these corporations under his control, he voted against it. He is only consistent when he is voting for the Methodist Church to rob the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I was present when the gentleman made the statement, but I did not fully understand it, and that is the reason I did not make any reply at the moment. After I read the RECORD and found what the remark was, I felt that I could not afford to let the matter pass unnoticed. The gentleman says I am only consistent when I am voting for the Methodist Church to rob the Treasury of the United States. I know of no bill which has been before this House in which the Methodist Church was interested except what was known as the Methodist Book Concern bill, which was to pay the publishing house of the Methodist Episcopal Church South $288,000 for the use of its publishing house during the war between the States. I worked and voted for that bill conscientiously, because I thought it was a just and honest measure, as the proof before the committee and the report of the committee showed.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Just let me finish my statement and then I will be glad to answer any question.

While that bill was pending before the House a rumor became somewhat current that a gentleman who was here working for the bill was to receive a lage fee, one-third of it. I at once spoke to the gentleman, Mr. E. B. Stahlman, about it, and he said he had no interest in the claim except as a member of the church and as a friend of Barbee & Smith. My distinguished colleague [Mr. GAINES of Tennessee] who introduced that bill spoke to me about it. He said there was absolutely no truth in the rumor, that Messrs. Barbee & Smith, the agents of the book concern, had so assured him. In corroboration he showed me a letter of Barbee & Smith, a part of which is as follows:

Mr. Stahlman, who, in connection with a large number of other matters, has been giving our matter some attention, will be in Washington again in the next few days, and he will be glad to talk to you about the matter.

With Mr. GAINES'S statement corroborated by the letter he showed me from Barbee & Smith, the trusted agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which said that Mr. Stahlman was here, and, in connection with a large number of other matters, was giving their matter some attention, I had no doubt of the truth of the statement of Mr. GAINES and Mr. Stahlman. It turned out that Mr. Stahlman had at that time a contract from the Book Agents to get 35 per cent of this claim, amounting to over $100,000. If he was worth that much when giving their matter only "some attention," what would his services have been worth if he had given it special attention? Therefore I worked and voted for the passage of that bill, believing it was honest, and that no fee was to be paid to any living mortal in behalf of this charitable work.

On the 31st of May, 1898, there appeared an item in the Washington Post that Mr. Stahlman was to be paid a fee of 35 per cent of the claim. I did not believe a word of it. But I wrote the following letter to Messrs. Barbee & Smith:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 31, 1898.

MESSRS. BARBEE & SMITH.
Agents, Nashville, Tenn.

DEAR SIRS: Inclosed find clipping from the Washington Post, which speaks for itself. Please give me a full statement as to the amounts paid Stahlman or anyone else. I want such a statement as can go into the RECORD. The investigation by Congress is almost certain to follow. If these rumors are true as to paying Stahlman or any number of persons 35 per cent of this claim, every cent of the $288,000 ought to be paid back to the United States.

No honorable use could have been made of so large a sum in securing the passage of the bill. This was no case of an ordinary claim of an individual before the Court of Claims in which large conditional fees are paid, but it was a sacred trust fund to be devoted to charitable purposes. Both Major Stahlman and Colonel Baker claimed that no commissions or percentage of this claim were to be paid to anyone, and upon that authority I assured many members that the rumor that had obtained to that effect was not true. It would have been impossible to have secured the passage of the bill had not such assurances been given. Members were deceived and caused to vote for the bill in this way, and they feel that the wrong should be righted and the Treasury placed in statu quo.

There is a cloud of scandal now hanging like a black pall over the Dome of the Capitol. I hope you will do all you can to remove it.

Yours, truly, T. W. SIMS.

I got no answer for about ten days—about fourteen days, in fact—when the following letter was received from Messrs. Barbee & Smith:

NASHVILLE, TENN., June 10, 1898.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of May 31 came to hand by due course of mail. It was couched in such extraordinary language and contained so many unwarrantable insinuations and demands that we have been debating in our minds whether or not you were entitled to any reply whatever; and now that we are promised an investigation by a Congressional committee of all the facts relating to the payment of our claim we have concluded to refrain from saying anything until this investigation shall have been had. When the investigation is completed, we shall give you such an answer as the facts and circumstances of the case demand. We shall probably do so at a later period, whether the investigation is had or not.

Respectfully,

BARBEE & SMITH, Book Agents.

This is the reply I got to the request for a letter giving the information asked for that should go into the RECORD. The subsequent letter, that was to follow, has never reached me. I submit, Mr. Speaker, to this House that my letter, written upon the very first intimation I had that such a fee contract had been entered into, required in good faith the return of every dollar of the appropriation, does not justify the gentleman in saying that "I showed my consistency only when I voted for the Methodist Church to rob the Treasury of the United States." I say to the membership of this House that if I have ever given any other vote on a Methodist Church bill I do not remember it. I believe that the claim was just and honest, and that it ought to have been paid; but rather than see the church approve such methods, I thought it ought to be paid back.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the membership of that great church are as pure, as good, as honest, as pious as any body of people upon the face of this green earth. I believe that the widows and orphans of that church to-day would out of their mites contribute a sufficient fund to deliver every dollar back to the Treasury rather than indirectly profit by the methods which were pursued in order to obtain the passage of the bill. I hope we will never hear of this matter again; but if the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has made this charge, or anyone else, will introduce a resolution or bill to have that money paid back, I will vote and work for it, not that I think that the claim was not a just one, but for the moral effect it will have on the church. The church was in no sense responsible for what was done, and have been exonerated by the Senate after full investigation. I again deny that the Methodist Episcopal Church South has ever directly or indirectly robbed the Treasury of the United States, and all such charges are false, absolutely false.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will indulge me; this is somewhat of a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee rise to a matter of personal privilege of his own?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my very honorable colleague states that he based his vote and action in this Methodist Church matter upon information received from me and from a letter that was directed to me by the book agent of that concern, and I desire to state this, that I had the utmost faith, the utmost confidence, in the gentlemen, Messrs. Barbee & Smith, who informed me ——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no question of personal privilege stated by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from New York is well taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the Chair will indulge me——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend. The Chair has stated that the point of order has been made that this is not a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman has a question of personal privilege he may proceed, but if not public business is not to be interfered with in this manner.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of three or four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I exceedingly regret that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] should have said of my colleague [Mr. SIMS] that "he is only consistent when he is voting for the Methodist Church to rob the Treasury of the United States." In explaining his relation to the passage of the bill providing for the payment of this claim my colleague states that he based his support of the measure upon information received from me and from the letter which has just been read, written me by Messrs. Barbee & Smith.

Now, I desire to say that the claim is entirely meritorious, as I will show later on, and which I demonstrated when the matter was pending in the House. I introduced the bill for its payment which became the law.

The information which I had in reference to the payment of this large fee to Major Stahlman was received from Messrs. Barbee & Smith in person, while the letter they wrote me led me to believe, very naturally, that Major Stahlman was in Washington on other business, which was the case, I then thought and still think, and that he would incidentally, or as a friend of the church, aid in the passage of this bill.

Messrs. Barbee & Smith stated to me that Major Stahlman was to receive no compensation for his services, and Major Stahlman said to me himself, and to many others of Congress, that he was not to receive one cent for his services.

Relying upon this information, it was natural for me and proper to repel the charge that this huge fee was to be paid Major Stahlman. I had known Dr. Barbee a number of years; he was my neighbor; he had been the pastor of the church I attended, officiated at my marriage and at the burial of several of my people, while Mr. Smith was my Sunday-school superintendent.

I relied implicitly upon what they in person said to me, and on what they wrote me in this letter, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, if I can not rely upon men of this class, of men whom I knew to be honorable and upright, upon whom could I rely or should rely?

When I received this letter from Messrs. Barbee and Smith, I determined to lay aside, as I did, my personal feeling toward Major Stahlman, entertaining as I did no friendly feeling for him. He is a distinguished Republican, living in my district, who had bitterly opposed my election to Congress, as did the newspaper which he owns, an Administration sheet, I may add.

But I laid all this aside and did all I could honorably for the passage of this bill. I saw Major Stahlman almost daily, as we boarded at the same hotel. But at no time did he tell me that he was to be paid any fee.

I knew he was in Washington often, and I thought was then on some railroad business pending in Washington, and I naturally believed that his offices in the matter were purely as a friend of the church.

I knew his family were members of the Methodist Church at Nashville, and that he affiliated with that church, and hence, as he said, he was working for the payment of this claim.

These facts alone, laying aside the letter of Messrs. Barbee and Smith, naturally led me to believe that his action in the matter was because he was a friend of the church.

I have given twice a statement of my entire history with the passage of this bill. I did so under oath, once before the Senate committee and recently in a deposition. My record in the matter I gladly gave the public when called on to do so. It is open for everyone to read, and I reaffirm here all that I have stated in these two statements.

Had I known that this enormous fee was to be paid Major Stahlman, or anyone else, for lobbying for this claim before Congress I would not have voted for the passage of the bill, and I certainly would not have misled my friends—the members of Congress—in the manner that I did when they asked me if the charge that this fee was to be paid was true and I said to them that there was no truth in the charge. I was misled, as you must see, and I am grieved that I misled my friends—members of Congress.

Now, a moment as to the merits of the claim. The United States Army while in Nashville used and consumed an immense amount—about $480,000 worth—of property of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The amount paid by Congress was $288,000. Gen. Clinton B. Fisk said this was a just claim. He, I think, was in Nashville when this property was taken.

Maj. A. W. Wills, a Republican, who was in Nashville at the time this property was taken, and who is now and has been several times the postmaster at Nashville, espoused this measure. Indeed, he was very active in its support.

The Hon. John C. Houk, a Republican, once a member of this House, indorsed it. So did Capt. J. W. Baker, a leading Republican of Nashville, and so have many other leading Republicans, as well as Democrats. The bishops of both branches of the Methodist Church indorsed it, including the colored bishops. I could give you a list as long as my arm of leading men whose names appear here in the RECORD containing the debate on this bill when pending in the House. The claim was absolutely meritorious. The history of the claim is odious now because of the deception practiced in procuring its passage, as I have stated, and as the Senate hearings on this matter clearly disclose. I thank the House for the opportunity granted me for making this statement.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the omnibus claims bill, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, having met, after a conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 2, and agree to the same.

That the committee report a disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 1.

THAD. M. MAHON,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
T. W. SIMS,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
WILLIAM E. MASON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAHON. I ask to have the statement read, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

Statement of House conferees to accompany report of conference committee on the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies, reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act.

That there is a practical agreement to everything except to the Selfridge board claims. Upon this part of amendment Senate refused to recede, and House conferees, obeying instructions of House, no free conference could be had in relation to same in order to bring the two Houses together.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] for a moment. As I understand, this report merely agrees to Senate amendment No. 2, which affects the title, and otherwise it reports a disagreement?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. I now ask that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and asks a new conference. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has either the right to ask unanimous consent or make the motion. Which does he do?

Mr. MAHON. I make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The question then is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask a further conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. When this motion is adopted, will it, under the practice of the House, vacate the former instructions to the conference committee?

The SPEAKER. If this motion is carried, it would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would leave the conferees uninstructed?

The SPEAKER. It would leave them uninstructed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will ask the Chair to recognize me later to further instruct the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its former instructions to the conferees in reference to the Selfridge board claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not clear as to the motion made by the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, several days ago the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. Will the gentleman please state his motion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move again, Mr. Speaker, that the House instruct the conferees on this bill not to agree to any of the items of the Senate amendment relating to the Selfridge board claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to instruct the conferees not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I want to be very frank with the House. The conferees recognize their duty to take the House into their confidence. There is a practical agreement, or will be, as to the balance of this bill. Now, to impose ironclad instructions upon the conferees means no conference whatever. I will be frank with the House and say that the conferees discussed the different phases of this matter—whether we should cut these claims as we did in the Fifty-fifth Congress, making a reduction of them, or whether they should be referred to the Court of Claims, or whether some other disposition should be made of them. These different propositions were talked over in the conference; but we were obliged to say to the Senate conferees: "Our hands are tied; we can not have any conference on this question whatever."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this House can trust these conferees. I believe that we can come to a conclusion finally that even the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will be pretty well satisfied is right. I think the House and Senate conferees can reach such a result. I can say for the House conferees that they have no idea except to treat the House fairly and give it every opportunity to carry out its will in this matter. The three conferees on the part of the House have been members of this House for a long time, and no man will charge that either of them would take any unfair advantage of the House. But if the motion of the gentleman from Alabama be adopted, this report will probably come back to the House in the same shape as it leaves it. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the motion be voted down, that the conferees may be left to a free conference, so that we can come back and make a report to the House. It may be a tentative report; we may come back and ourselves ask instructions. But what is the use of appointing conferees and then not allowing them to confer? We have got to fix this bill up. We might as well face the issue.

So far as I am personally concerned, there is not a dollar involved here affecting anyone in my district or within 100 or 500 miles of it. I am one of those men who stand on this floor and exercise their convictions regardless of the consequences either to their constituents or to themselves.

Of course, whatever this House will instruct the conferees will carry out; but it is merely playing with the question to instruct them in this way. If such instructions be adopted, all we can do is simply to say to the Senate conferees, "We can not confer," and then come right back to the House with the same kind of a report we now make. The House can either defeat this bill in toto or can have it arranged in conference in a shape satisfactory to the House and then pass it. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not care whether it goes up or goes down. I have no personal feeling in the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, his statement is that the Senate refuses to enter into any agreement that does not in some way care for the so-called Selfridge board claims. Is that correct?

Mr. MAHON. That is correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. And then you suggest that if the House will send its conferees into conference unhampered by the instructions, that then it may be possible to reach an agreement whereby these claims will either be allowed at a less amount or that they may be sent to the Court of Claims for adjudication there. Is that correct?

Mr. MAHON. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is through, I desire recognition, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, the item in dispute involves legislation and was proposed by the Senate.

Mr. MAHON. Entirely.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that when one body proposes legislation and appropriations or legislation without appropriations upon a bill that contains many other items, that that body recedes, under parliamentary practice and usage as to such matters proposed, if the other body insists upon it? Or, to put it another way, the so-called claims involve legislation, as many other matters upon this bill, and if the House refuses to assent to the proposed legislation, under parliamentary usages the Senate would recede.

Mr. MAHON. I do not know that they may; but we have to have a conference.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking of what the usage is.

Mr. MAHON. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MADDOX. I desire only to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had addressed the Chair.

Mr. MAHON. Just a moment, and I will give the gentleman the floor.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the conferees have agreed on everything except these Selfridge board claims?

Mr. MAHON. There is a tentative agreement, but not a final one, I will say to the gentleman; there is a tentative agreement as to the balance of the amendment, to be frank with the gentleman. Now, I just want to say one word more. The Committee on War Claims was not responsible for the insertion of the Selfridge board claims, so called, and others. In the Senate they sent over claims to this House. They go to the Patent Committee, they go to the Military Committee, and to the different committees in the House. The Committee on Claims in the Senate have under consideration a large number of claims.

In fact, all the claims which the War Claims Committee do not have control of, and some which the Committee on Claims in the House have no control of, are referred to that large committee. We sent our bill over to the Senate. That committee, composed of some fourteen or fifteen Senators, some of whom are among the leading members of the Senate, amended this bill, adding claims to it that had passed either one or the other branch of Congress or upon which there were reports from either the Senate or the House. There is no item in this bill except as has been canvassed by the committees of the House or by the House itself. The Senate committee amended this bill. That committee in the Senate was unanimous in reporting the bill, and they insist they are certainly entitled to some consideration. It was passed through the Senate as amended by the unanimous vote of the Senate. Every Senator in that body supported this bill. Now, it came over for conference.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how many different Congresses have refused to pay these claims?

Mr. MAHON. What claims?

Mr. POU. The Selfridge claims that you are speaking of.

Mr. MAHON. That has been talked of. I do not want to enter into that discussion. In the Fifty-fifth Congress there was $224,000 of them. These claims aggregated the sum of $290,000. At that time I was a member of the committee on conference and after a full conference we reduced these claims 20 per cent and finally passed them. They have been passed by Congress as individual claims, I do not know how many, but quite a number. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this House ought to give these conferees a free conference, and I will say very frankly that I will try to carry out the wishes of this House and get the very best terms I can from the Senate, either get them to recede altogether or agree to treat these claims exactly as the Fifty-fifth Congress treated them, by cutting them 20 per cent, or an agreement to send them to the Court of Claims and get rid of them in some way. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the passage of the claims bill after conference in the Fifty-fifth Congress was not made upon a statement that there was nothing in the bill that had not been ratified by the committee and without reading the items?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

Mr. PARKER. That is my recollection.

Mr. MAHON. The Senate put these claims in, and the House, after two or three conferences and after consultation among the members of the House, passed the bill.

Mr. PARKER. My recollection was that the chairman of the committee stated that there were no claims there that had not been ratified by the committee.

Mr. MAHON. When?

Mr. PARKER. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, when some of these Selfridge claims went in.

Mr. MAHON. I do not know what was said. You can get the RECORD and see. I stand by what I said at the time.

Mr. PARKER. My difficulty about the matter was that the gentleman made the mistake of putting in one claim that I had reported against, and a Selfridge claim at that.

Mr. MAHON. I did not put it in. That was put in in the Senate.

Mr. PARKER. I know that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], chairman of the Committee on Claims, says that he thinks the House ought to allow the conference committee to return to the conference room with a free hand and uninstructed. Now, I have no personal criticism to make of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or his colleagues.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. Will you agree to instruct the conferees to cut these claims 20 per cent, as you did in the Fifty-sixth Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainty not.

Mr. MAHON. Or to send them to the Court of Claims?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not.

Mr. MAHON. You want to defeat the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not. I want to defeat these claims, because I think these claims are wrong. If I thought these claims were right I would be willing to pay them in full—if they were just claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You are in favor of paying all these Southern war claims in this bill, involving rents and destruction of schoolhouses and churches at Clarksville and other points, I suppose——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. And do you suppose that this side of the House will stand by and see you fight against everything to pay Union claims, and then pay out of the Treasury your claims of the character that I have described?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, now, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is this case.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not until I have answered the question of the gentleman from Ohio. I can not answer two questions at the same time. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that as far as my record is concerned in voting for claims, there is no blemish upon it. Since I have been a member of this House I have only voted for claims that have been found just by the courts to which this House has referred them. I have never gone outside, and if the gentleman can find a vote where I have favored the payment of a claim from my district or from the South that has not been held by the courts to be required to be paid by this Congress, I challenge him to find it in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will ask the gentleman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question? I see no reason for him at this time to bring in this question, when we are discussing outside claims. I will say that I am perfectly willing to pay the Bowman Act claims in this bill, because the House of Representatives of the United States referred them to the Court of Claims, a court organized by this House——

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman please wait until I finish my statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield. The gentleman from Indiana is out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A court organized by Congress for the purpose of determining these questions; and when they have found judgment in favor of the claimants, then I have always voted for the bill. I have never secured the passage of a claims bill in this House myself since I have been a member of Congress, and these are the only bills that I have voted for. The reason that I am willing to vote for these Bowman Act claims is because the court has rendered judgments in favor of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has not answered my question at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In this bill stands quite a number of strictly Southern war claims. One of them is a claim from Clarksville, Tenn., for the use and occupation, and possibly the destruction, of a church, and the members of that church, through their leading officer, have been up here to see me within a few days, and have begged me to stand by that claim. I have looked into it. It is simply a war claim, on the same footing with any war claim for the ravages of war, and has never been found by any court to be a valid claim. And what I put to the gentleman was if that is not true, if you are supporting the bulk of this bill, including these war claims, why, you are fighting claims that grew out of the action of the Government in time of war. I want to point to the gentleman the record, speaking about our attitude upon this particular bill, and I want to point out to you if you can defeat one side of the bill doubtless the other side can just as easily be defeated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not advocated this bill since it has been in the House so far as the war claims in here are concerned. I think the proper course to be pursued, and I always have thought so, would be to send them to the Court of Claims, and let that court determine the facts, because I do not think Congress is competent to judge of these matters.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. DAVIS rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama contend under the Bowman Act reference provides for a judgment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, some of them are under the Bowman Act and some under the Tucker Act. In the Bowman Act cases it is the findings of the court.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a finding, but not a judgment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But its findings are conclusions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Precisely, as the Selfridge board findings are conclusions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What finding?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Selfridge board findings, and under the Bowman Act findings of the Court of Claims, too.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was referred to them to find out whether or not the building of these boats cost the contractors anything more than the contract price, and they reported that the boats had cost more than the contract price. Now, that is what that does; but the Government—the Senate and the House of Representatives—at that time were not satisfied. Why? Because the Selfridge board did not take any evidence, did not consider any evidence, in the matter but the contractors themselves. The only evidence before the Selfridge board was from the contractors, and the only question asked was whether it cost them more to build the boats than the contract price.

Mr. MAHON. Now, I know the gentleman wants to be fair. The gentleman knows that the board was Admiral Selfridge and a number of other officers, like all of those men, who make you give 36 inches to the yard. You know that for eighteen months they went to the shipyard offices of these men, examined the books, examined the vouchers in detail, put these men on the stand—the only men who could know what they were talking about. It was not UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, or MAHON, of Pennsylvania. They went to the men who had the books and documents, and after months the board detailed by the Secretary of the Navy made this finding.

Now, without reference to the merits of these claims, I say that these findings were made from a more careful examination than they could make in the Court of Claims; and I am willing that they should go there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want the House to understand it fully. The gentleman concurs in what I said.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman what possible harm can there be in allowing these conferees to go back to the conference room untrammeled? Suppose the committee should make a report to this House which the House was unwilling to adopt. Is it not within our power to refuse to adopt that report? Why, then, trammel them in advance?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the gentleman's question in a few minutes, but I want to finish the answer to this other question first.

Now, there is no disagreement between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself in reference to the Selfridge board; and I assert, and he admits, that the only evidence ever brought before the Selfridge board was of these contractors, and were the contractors themselves and their books.

Mr. MAHON. Who else could give them evidence?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, there are other ways of finding out whether the Government owes the claimant anything. The question was not whether the Government owed them any more but whether it cost them any more than the contract price of the boats they had contracted for. There is no dispute about that. That being the case, forty years ago the Congress of the United States was unwilling to appropriate this money on that proposition and upon that finding of facts, and they appointed another board, known as the Marchand Board, to investigate whether these things ought to be paid for, as the Selfridge Board was appointed to find out from the contractor if said vessels had cost them more than the contract price, and to determine whether the Government of the United States really owed these claimants or not. And that board examined and reported that the Government ought to pay $287,000 on some of these claims, I believe, and turned down the balance of the claims.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I can.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman is correct so far. They examined four or five claims and allowed $200,000. Now, that board made that allowance after sitting less than four months, while the other board took seventeen months. On that examination of three or four months they allowed $200,000 on three, four, or five of the boats; and the gentleman is very familiar with the fact that after they had done that they closed the gates on the other people and turned them out of court, If they had investigated them they would have had to sit over a year to have done so. I want to be fair, and I want to say nothing against the Marchand Board, but it was not composed of experts. The gentleman knows who they were?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They were naval officers?

Mr. MAHON. They were not standing as naval officers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Was not Admiral Marchand added to the board?

Mr. MAHON. He had arrived at the period of old age and was utterly unfit for many reasons to go into an examination of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know nothing of the personnel of the men that were appointed on the Marchand board. I know the Marchand board was appointed under an act of Congress and appointed by the President of the United States, and I assume that he appointed naval officers that were competent.

Mr. MAHON. Not by the President of the United States, but by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It amounts to the same thing, by the executive officer of the United States. Now, their contention as to why these claims should be paid now before this House and some years after Congress passed upon it was that the Government had changed the contracts, but as I did the other day, I called the attention of the House, and I call it again, to the fact that when Senator Grimes, of Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Claims in the Senate before whom this Marchand report was made, reported to the House and stated to the House that no change whatever had been made in the contract, Senator Sherman, of Ohio, made the same statement, and the Secretary of the Navy at that time reported to the House and the Senate that there had been no change made in the contract whatever. Now, that was forty years ago. They were repudiated by that Congress. They were reported by boards appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and that board investigated them. There is no reason in the world why they should be paid.

Since that time it is true that above the contract price Congress has authorized the payment of $5,000,000 to these contractors, 40 per cent more than the contract price that they agreed to receive.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. The Senate seems to have differed with the House on that proposition. They have amended the House bill by adding the Selfridge board claims to it. A conference has been arranged between the two Houses. So far these conferees have not been able to agree. Our conferees return and say they are unable to agree with the Senate conferees on this one item, and they say they desire to go back into conference upon it.

Now, without undertaking to discuss the Selfridge board claims, what I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama is this: Where the Senate has differed from us, where they have sent conferees to meet our conferees, our conferees knowing the sense of this House, why need we trammel them further with instructions, why not let them go into conference untrammeled, that they may be at liberty to undertake to adjust these matters?

Mr. WANGER. Would not that be a clear backdown from the position that the House has taken?

Mr. SIMS. That is what it means exactly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is the material question now before the House, as to whether we should yield. I do not want to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania any injustice. He asks to go back uninstructed, and without intending any personal reflection on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I want to state to the House why I believe this conference committee should not be allowed to go back to conference uninstructed.

What is the history of the matter? My friend from Florida says this is the way to reach this question. When the Senate put these claims on this bill, and it came to the House, it was taken up in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and considered. The House acted on the matter, they struck out the Selfridge board claims by a vote of the Committee of the Whole, and sent it to conference with these claims stricken out.

Now, every man upon this floor knows that when the House has acted by vote on a particular question, it has always, both in the House and the Senate, been considered an instruction to the conferees on that particular question. So that the House conferees went into the first conference practically instructed by the House not to agree to the Selfridge board claims.

What was the result? They went into conference—two of them—Mr. SIMS did not sign the report, but two of the House conferees immediately agreed with the Senate that these claims should be paid. They reported to the House. How? Not so that we could have a separate vote on the question; not so the House could again determine whether it wanted to pay the Selfridge board claims or not, but they came in here by unanimous agreement, and if it had not been for a point of order made so that the conference report was rejected on the point of order, this House would have been compelled to vote for the whole bill, and could not have singled out these separate items, but would have been compelled to vote for the bill in toto without opportunity to exercise its judgment.

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman know that that was one amendment, and that the report was made strictly in accordance with parliamentary law, and it could not be made in any other way?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If the conferees wanted to, they could have come back here and reported agreement on all the other items to the Senate amendment except the Selfridge board claim, and then said to the House, "We ask for further instructions in reference to the Selfridge board claim," and give the House an opportunity to have voted on that proposition. The gentleman knows that.

Well, now, what is the result? Several days ago this bill was again sent to conference. The conferees were instructed. And what do we find was the result in the other Chamber? We find that the chairman of the committee there reports the bill back, asking for a disagreement; and I do not think I am exceeding parliamentary law when I state that when it was asked on the floor of the Senate why he did not make a motion to recede, he stated—it is in this morning's RECORD—that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired to put this question to another vote in this House.

Mr. MAHON. I did not look at the RECORD——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you will look at Senator WARREN'S remarks, you will find I am correct.

Mr. MAHON. Let the gentleman be fair. There was no conference on these Selfridge board claims; there could be none, and the gentleman knows it. Absolutely the only thing that could be done by the House conferees was to come back to the House and report a disagreement. Why should I ask what the gentleman thinks I should have asked? I was under the instructions of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentlemen what I believe his duty to be——

Mr. MAHON. I do not propose to take orders from the gentleman from Alabama. I am willing to listen to his speech and to his advice, but not when put in that way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Alabama ought to be willing to trust a committee of this House without issuing verbal orders to them in advance. The gentleman has been undertaking to run the business of the House for the last two or three weeks. He has succeeded tolerably well—very well, indeed—but it seems to me that if he would not issue his orders quite so peremptorily the committees of the House might be freer to do their business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] can, of course, criticise me personally; I have no objection to his criticisms; but what I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is this: I am criticising the gentleman in all good feeling and without intending anything personal to him, but I think he has not treated the House in this matter as it should have been treated. As I said, he received instructions in the beginning from the House.

Mr. MAHON. Where from?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAHON. The Committee of the Whole can not instruct, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, such action has always been recognized, as I said a while ago.

Mr. MAHON. I do not recognize the instruction of less than 100 members of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, we are agreed on that.

Now, the other day the gentleman had the direct instructions of this House. Now, I say he has not dealt fairly with the House. When he went into conference this amendment had been put on the bill by the Senate. I know the gentleman is in favor of these Selfridge board claims. I do not criticise him for that. He is entitled to believe that they are right just as much as I am entitled to believe that they are wrong; but when he sits on a conference committee he is not acting in his individual capacity; he is acting for the House, and he must express the will of the House. Now, the will of the House has been declared. I say it was the duty of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say to the Senate conferees, "We will not report this question back to the House until you report the bill to the Senate and ask them to vote whether or not they will recede from their amendment." The gentleman knows that that is the way in which an agreement should have been reached, as the Senate had put on the amendment.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Alabama will allow me to ask whether he would be willing that these Selfridge board claims should go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not. I will say candidly that I think these men have received 40 per cent more than the contract price. I may be wrong, but in my judgment the claims are unjust and ought not to be paid. I do not think the House ought to trifle with them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me say, and incidentally I will answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], that these parties have no desire to go to the Court of Claims——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Whom does the gentleman mean?

Mr. CANNON. These Selfridge board claimants. I say they have no desire to go to the Court of Claims unless they can go there with legislation which would practically direct the Court of Claims to find judgment for them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it a fact that some of these claims—not the present claims, but claims growing out of the same subject-matter—have been passed upon by the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all, unless by direction of Congress. If we would send these claims or any other claims to the Court of Claims with instructions to enter judgment, the claimants would, of course, welcome such action.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That, of couse, would not be such a hearing as we would expect or helpful to claimants; at least it would not satisfy me.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I say they have no desire to go to the Court of Claims unless they go there with legislation that practically tells the Court of Claims to find judgment for them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Would the gentleman be opposed to allowing these claims to go to the Court of Claims in the usual way—under an enabling act.

Mr. CANNON. They do not ask to have that done.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I thought I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suggest such action.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania either did not realize the full scope of his statement, or was not as candid as he usually is to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to say this: That if you let this matter go back to conference without instructions and the conferees pursue the same course that they pursued before in this matter, this question will come back in such shape that we can not separate these votes, where we have to vote for the whole conference report to reject it or not reject it at all. It was presented here in such shape that men who have claims in this bill which they believe to be legitimate will find themselves not left free and independent to vote on those claims. More than that, it was the duty of the House conferees to send this to the Senate and force a vote in the Senate as to whether they would recede or not before it was brought back to the House. More than that, after these instructions are asked, if the House does not insist on its instructions, the Senate will believe that we are ready to back down and will delay the passage of this bill rather than expedite it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the House, I presume, desires all the light on this question that they can get, as well on the action of the conferees as on the merits of the claims. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has thrown out some intimations here about cutting down 20 per cent and sending to the Court of Claims. Therefore, I suppose I will not be violating confidence to state with what reception those propositions were met by the conferees except myself. It is well known that I am the only member of that committee of conference who is opposed to these claims. I fought them in this House from the time they came up. I fought them before the Committee on War Claims, and for no other reason under heaven than that I thought they were unjust and ought not to be paid.

In that first conference I asked them if they would not accept them with a reduction of 20 per cent. No. I then suggested, Why not let them go to the Court of Claims, as you do those monitor claims in the latter part of the bill? Why, the other conferees claimed that they believed that the Court of Claims would give more than the Selfridge board had. Now, they come up here and talk about going to the Court of Claims as a last resort.

I say I would have no objection to going to the Court of Claims under a proper bill, but I do not want a bill drawn for this or any other matter that manacles the court and leaves it nothing to perform but a clerical act. I believe the Senate will recede on this amendment, although the Senate conferees have not intimated such a thing. It is their proposition, and I do not believe they will see the bill fail. But I want to say this in response to some inquiries by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] about Southern claims. From my own district there are several claims. From the State of Tennessee there are a great many more.

One claim referred to is the Clarksville claim, and I want to say here to the gentleman from Ohio and to this House that, as long as I am a member of that committee, if I have got to vote for a claim that I conscientiously do not believe we owe in order to get this House to pay one that I do believe we owe, I will never do it, whether they come from my district, the South, or anywhere else. [Applause.] I do not know who owns the Selfridge board claims. I have heard rumors, which I will not refer to on the floor of the House. I do not know whether they are Republicans or Democtats, from the North or the South, and I do not care. Where are the French spoliation claims owned, amounting to $750,000, in this bill? Where are the State claims from? There is no politics in this, as far as I am concerned.

The gentleman knows that in committee I stand and fight Southern claims when I think they ought not to be paid. I do it continually, all the time, and expect to do it in every instance where I believe they are unjust and unreasonable. Mr. Speaker, if there is anything worse than a general omnibus bill, in which you can dump anything and then force a member to vote for it in order to get his own little claim, I do not know what it is. Here is a bill passed by the House, carrying $198,000 of claims, upon which the Court of Claims makes favorable findings. I could not put a church bill on, nor you nor anybody else in the House. No; all this thing must be done in the Senate. So that you may come into this House with some nice little bill which the House would accept and send it over to the Senate, and then let it be loaded down with everything that has been accumulating there for twenty years, and when you ask me to vote for it in order to get the other through, I want to say that I am not built that way.

If this Congress sees fit to deny the payment of Tennessee claims, when it does not question their justice, in order that it may force a Tennessee member to vote for an unjust claim which he has investigated and thinks he understands and knows all about, you have struck the wrong man, as far as I am concerned, and I will take all the results that may follow. If these claims from the South are never paid until they are paid by compromises, until the House accepts anything and everything in order to get them paid, I say let them go. Tennessee can do without them. I want to say that I think the chairman and the Republican membership of this Committee on War Claims have been as liberal on Southern claims as they could be. They have often been more liberal than myself. They have not drawn party lines nor sectional lines. My objection to them is that they do not draw the line against all claims as tightly as I think they ought to; but that is a matter merely of judgment and judgment only.

I say I want the instructions of this House on those claims. I have very little company on the other side in opposing them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has just admitted that he is heartily in favor of them, and if he wants a witness to prove it I will prove it for him. If you do not vote for these instructions it virtually amounts to an instruction to go back and agree to these claims. That is what it will amount to. I appeal to my friends on this side and on that side, everywhere in this House, if you have a small just claim in this bill or a big just claim in this bill, vote for these instructions and let us try it again. Do like me, and let your claim go down in good company rather than go through in bad company. If it can not get justice here in the American Congress without voting for something that no man on the floor of this House, according to my judgment, can justify, then let the bill fail.

These contracts for this steam machinery were entered into in 1862 and 1863, amounting in round numbers to $14,000,000. As far as I can find, the specifications were not changed. Delays were caused. The claim is made that labor and material went up in price, and no doubt they did. The Government settled this matter, and upon the $14,000,000 they paid $5,000,000 in addition, and now, forty years afterwards, they come in here and ask you to pay what the Selfridge board found it cost them more than the contract. This is not an ordinary private claim. There is a question of policy involved here. You are laying down a precedent for this Congress and others in the future to act upon. We are letting large contracts every day for ships and for naval supplies. If a man takes a contract, and afterwards comes to Congress or to the Navy Department and says, "I lost money on my contract," then, according to this precedent, you will have to pay him what he claims he lost.

Mr. BOWIE. Forty years afterwards.

Mr. SIMS. Forty years afterwards pay him what he claims upon his own ex parte statement that he lost. Naval contractors and Government contractors can be as careless as they please in bidding. All they have got to do afterwards is to show that they did not make money out of their contracts. But where is the contractor who ever did any work for the Government, who made more money out of his contract than he thought he would on account of declining prices in labor and material, who ever came up and dumped back his profits into the Treasury of the United States? If gentlemen have items in this bill that they believe are just, they have just as much right to believe it as I have; but just simply because they may be afraid that somebody has influence enough to defeat this bill unless unjust claims are allowed to remain in it, they ought not to vote for what they believe to be unjust.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I want to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois in his own right.

Mr. CANNON. I only want a very few minutes, if I can have the attention of the House. I do not propose at this time, because I do not think it is necessary, to argue the merits of these claims. I will simply crave the attention of the House while I give what I understand to be the parliamentary history of this bill.

The House passed an omnibus claims bill for less than $200,000, based exclusively on findings of the Court of Claims, with favorable recommendations. That bill went to the Senate. The Senate assented to everything in the House bill, saying, "Yes, that is right;" and then added between two and three million dollars—I may not be exactly accurate as to the figures—of claims of other kinds, many of them dating back almost a century. It may be that some of them are good. I have no doubt that many of them are bad. They sent these claims back in one amendment to the House with their compliments. Now, this is a bad way to legislate to begin with, because a good claim for a hundred dollars or five hundred dollars, with your constituent or mine back of it, frequently will drag through a bad claim. I hope while I serve in the House that never again will there be an omnibus claims bill of any kind pass this House or pass the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHON. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: What is the difference; why should we pass an omnibus public buildings bill carrying $18,000,000? And I am frank to say that the Government will be better off if many of them were not built; they will be a white elephant on the hands of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Supposing that to be true. Do two legislative outrages sanctify one? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAHON. We are legislating that way.

Mr. CANNON. I will not be switched off by that suggestion. This bill came back from the Senate and was considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. It was discussed back and forth, and the House recommended disagreement—the committee first, and the House confirmed the action of the committee. It went back to the Senate, a conference was had, and on the first conference the House conferees—and I am not criticising them; they had the right, the parliamentary right—reported back an agreement. That agreement was rejected by the House, without reference to these claims, as the gentleman recollects.

Then, as was his parliamentary right, a member of this House moved an instruction to the conferees not to assent to the Selfridge board claims. I have seen it done fifty times; I have been on a conference myself, and other gentlemen have been on conferences. That registered the will of this legislative body; and on a yea-and-nay vote there was an overwhelming majority in favor of that instruction. They went back to conference, and come back here and report another agreement; and the conferees, or a majority of them, ask to be relieved of that instruction. Now, suppose you relieve them of that instruction. That is morally equivalent to instructing them to go back and write the Selfridge board claims in. That is all there is of it. Now then, in my judgment, the Selfridge board claims ought not to be paid. I will not go into the argument. I have been familiar with them for a quarter of a century, and it is perfectly clear to my mind.

Some gentlemen think they ought to be paid; but, if paid—forty years old, no legal judgment, never went to the Court of Claims, because they had nothing to go on, and will not go now unless you legislate so as to direct the Court of Claims to enter a judgment—if ever paid, they ought to be paid standing alone, where the House and the Senate can treat them as a single proposition. They ought not to be brought in here with a lot of good claims, and perhaps some bad ones, and pulled through under stress. Now, then, I shall vote for one for the proposed instruction, similar to the instruction that on the yea-and-nay vote was given the other day; and I have no doubt myself that when they go back with that instruction that the coordinate body of Congress will ascertain that this body is in earnest, and as that body proposed this legislation—and it is legislation, under the ordinary rule—they will recede.

Ah, but says somebody, maybe the bill will fail. No, no! [Laughter.] Do not fear that. The House bill carried $175,000. The bill still carries, after these claims are stricken out, over $2,000,000 that the Senate put in. Now there are enough Senators representing their constituents not to let the bill fail. [Laughter and applause.] Do not be afraid. I will write a policy for the thousandth part of a mill on a thousand dollars that it will not fail. [Laughter.] I think it is proper to assert the will of this body in a parliamentary, decent, usual way. Therefore, without delaying the House further, for one, when the vote is taken I shall vote again, the second time, for the instruction. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on War Claims, I am constrained to disagree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman, and I propose very briefly to give to the House some of the reasons for declining to follow the leadership of the chairman, in whom I repose very great confidence and for whom I have a very high regard.

These bills properly belong to the War Claims Committee, as much as the Claims Committee of the Senate. They are war claims, if anything, and there is no more reason for their being attached by the Claims Committee of the Senate than attached to any war claim to be considered. They were before the Committee on War Claims, but received no consideration at the hands of that committee whatever before the bill went to the Senate. After this bill came back from the Senate, by an order of this House it was again referred to the Committee on War Claims, and then it received no consideration whatever. A motion was made to nonconcur, and that was carried. But, Mr. Speaker, I have taken some pains to investigate these claims, because I think that I sat in a judicial capacity and as a sworn duty to decide these matters according to the law and evidence, just as a judge upon the bench, and in that spirit I have examined this question.

What is the history of these cases? It is asserted that when these parties built ships for the Government, owing to certain changes and the increase in labor and material, they lost money, and for that reason the United States ought to reimburse them now. In the first place, there is no evidence that they lost any money except the report of the Selfridge board, which said that they did, and they heard that side of the case alone. In the second place, every man in the House knows that the rise in labor and material had occurred in large part before these men built the ships. They did not build them at the beginning of the war, they built them while material and labor was advancing in price. These men, if they were business men, must have carefully taken into consideration the advance in labor and material when they made the contract.

After the war was over the Senate authorized the appointment of the Selfridge board. The concurrence of the House was never asked. So far as we know, the concurrence of the House was never wanted. That board heard only one side of the case and reported that there were large amounts of money due to the contractors by reason of their having lost money by the increased price of wages and material. The House at that time, while it was fresh in the minds of the people, while they were much more familiar with the facts than they can be now, decided that they could not allow these claims, and they appointed another board. By the joint action of both Houses of Congress, under a law regularly enacted in legal form, a legal and competent board was appointed to go over these cases, and that was known as the Marchand board. I find some of their findings reported in the Senate Document No. 1821 of the Fifty-third Congress.

That board reported November 26, 1867, when the matter was all fresh, when they had the cases before them and all the information that was obtainable on the subject. They made a report, and I will give some items from that report. It might be profitable to put the whole of it in the RECORD. They are arranged in regular form. Some of these items are contained in this bill, and some of them are not. I want to say it is a curious circumstance, but I wanted to get hold of the bill and the Senate report in order to compare it with the Marchand report, and I could not find a copy of it in the document room.

Now I read from the report:

Secor & Co. and Perrine, Secor & Co., river and harbor monitors Manhattan, Tecumseh, and Mahopac, contract price, $1,380,000; whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, as claimed by the contractors, $1,236,101.22; amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as determined by the board to be due, $115,539.01; amount already paid the contractors over and above the contract price (obtained from the bureaus), $321,195.58.

Now, this shows that they have received some $400,000 more than the Marchand board found was due them. In every item the Marchand board found that the contractor who claimed to have lost money had already been paid more than the amount which was due him.

Mr. ROBERTS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Marchand board found there was due Secor & Co. and Perine, Secor & Co. for the three monitors built by them, due to increased cost over the contract price, one million two hundred and thirty-six odd thousand dollars, and that the Selfridge board made a finding in behalf of Secor & Co. of that amount?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; I did not say anything of the kind. I said the Marchand board said that is the amount they claimed was due them.

Mr. ROBERTS. Did not the gentleman say that the Selfridge board found that amount due them?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; I do not know what the Selfridge board found. I have not got their findings.

Mr. ROBERTS. I understood the gentleman to say that the Selfridge board found so much extra due them.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; I am reading from a Senate document, and the report says that the whole increased cost of work over the contract price as claimed by the contractor was $1,236,191.22.

Mr. ROBERTS. What does the gentleman say about the action of the Selfridge board in regard to this?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have not those figures before me. I do not know how much they found. I do know that the Marchand board was a creature of the law and the Selfridge board was not. The Marchand board was a board regularly organized by acts passed by both Houses of Congress, and I would rather take their judgment than to take a board that was simply appointed by resolution. I know nothing about the personnel of this Selfridge board. I do not know which board was best calculated to decide them. I do know that one board was constituted by law. It may be true that there are lawyers in this city who are just as well qualified to give a judgment as any judge upon the Court of Claims; but I would not take an opinion given by those lawyers as quick as I would one by the Court of Claims. Here is a court authorized by law, and they find in every single instance—I want to call the attention of the House to this fact—they find in every single instance that the men who built these ships have been already paid more than this board found that they ought to have.

Mr. ROBERTS. I want to ask the gentleman a question before he gets away from this matter of the findings of the Marchand board. Does not the gentleman understand that that board was instructed to find the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. They were instructed to find that as a fact?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, what did they find?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. They found, of course, the amount of the increased work and found that the parties had already been paid more than was properly due them.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, then, do they not in their table say that the increased cost of the work over the contract price as claimed by the contractor is so much——

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBERTS. And then they do not find as the result of their work that that was a fact; they simply take the word of the contractor and assume that that was the case.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Oh, no; they do not do anything of the kind. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then, will the gentleman take the position that in the first item of increase, the sum of $1,226,000 was the actual increased cost over the contract price?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; I take it it was not.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then, if you do not take that position, you have got to say that the Marchand board did not follow their instructions, because they were instructed to find that fact.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me. They give the amount of such increase caused by the delay of the action of the Government, as determined by the board of review.

Mr. ROBERTS. Ah, but the gentleman is dodging again. That was still another point that they were to find, in addition to the findings of the cost over and above the contract price. They were to go beyond that. That was one fact which they were to find; and the next was how much of that increased cost was brought about through the fault or negligence of the Government. There were two distinct propositions.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. If the finding was not as I have stated, I am unable to understand the plain English of it.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is what I think—that the gentleman does not understand the plain English of this report of the Marchand board. If he will study it a little more, if he will read what the instructions to the board were, and what they did, he will understand the matter better.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have read exactly from the report.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want to know whether I understand this matter, and would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY] a question or two.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. These claimants made a claim against the Government——

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. And the Senate and the House passed a bill which was approved and became a law, authorizing the Marchand board?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes; that is the way I understand it.

Mr. RAY of New York. And that board was to determine the amount that ought to be paid these claimants?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. That is my understanding.

Mr. RAY of New York. And the Marchand board made the examination and made their report?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY of New York. And it was assumed that whatever the Marchand board reported would be fair compensation for all claims?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. The Marchand board found that in every instance where they made report the parties had already been paid more than was their due.

Mr. ROBERTS. More than the contract price—nothing further.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then these claimants, not satisfied with the findings of that board, and after having accepted the judgment of the Marchand board and the money that had been found due them, come forward and, on the same grounds, make a still further claim?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Yes; there is nothing small about them; they keep on coming.

Mr. RAY of New York. They had a judgment in their favor; they accepted it and took the money; and now they want another judgment for the same thing?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. They keep coming right on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not read all these items. I simply call the attention of the House to the fact that the Marchand board finds that in every single instance the parties have been already paid more than was due them. That ought to be conclusive of the subject.

Something has been said here about sending these cases to the Court of Claims. I violate no confidence when I say that in a brief filed by one of the attorneys for a part of these claims he stated that these claims would have no standing at all in the Court of Claims, because they are not founded upon any legal claim, but are simple claims in equity; that there was no use in taking them to the Court of Claims, and that the parties did not want any bill authorizing them to take them there. These parties do not want a bill authorizing them to go to the Court of Claims; they want a direct appropriation.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman please inform the House in how many cases the Marchand board made an award?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Oh, well, that is a matter of computation. I could count them if necessary.

Mr. ROBERTS. Is it not a fact that an award was made in only 7 cases out of 50 or 60 before the board?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; there are 50 or 60 reported here——

Mr. ROBERTS. But there are only 7 where an award was made.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. As I understand, they make a finding in every one of these cases. Let me read at random:

Alexander Swift & Co., river and harbor monitors Oneota and Catawba. Contract price, $220,000. Whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, as claimed by the contractors, $665,757.22.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman go a little further and state to the House if the Marchand board made any finding in favor of Swift & Co.?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. They made a finding in every instance, but in some instances they found nothing at all was due them.

Mr. ROBERTS. In all these 50 or 60 cases the Marchand board, while they found that the contract price was so much, and while they found that the cost over and above the contract price was so much, and while they found that the contractor had received so much for extra work over and above the contract price, yet in only 7 cases did they find the Government was at fault, and make an allowance in those 7 cases. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have always understood that when a plaintiff comes into court and the judgment of the court is that he take nothing that he lost the case. The Marchand board simply found these men did not lose anything, as they claimed they did, and rendered their finding to that effect.

Mr. ROBERTS. Does the gentleman mean when they found the excess of cost is merely the amount of the contract price——

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I decline to yield further. Now, I have no prejudice against these men. I do not know who they are.

Mr. MAHON. They are all dead.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I do not know who holds these claims; I do not care. I am considering it from a purely legal point of view. I think they have not made out a case, and I think the Committee on War Claims of this House take the same view, or a majority of them do. I think this House can be engaged in no better service than in guarding the Treasury against raids of this character. They will keep on coming up. Gentlemen may talk about precedent, that we have paid some claims like these, and that, therefore, we ought to pay these. Precedent will continue to return and plague us, and if we pay these claims the action of the House to-day will be stated as a precedent for paying other claims a hundred years from now. The only safety is in refusing to pay them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, it does not appear from any report, but I think every man in this House who is old enough to remember the dark days in the war knows that the men who were engaged in building Government vessels and the men who were engaged in furnishing the Government supplies were not in business for their health. They made their contracts and made them high enough to cover all contingencies liable to arise. These men have been paid in full. In all conscience they ought to stop, and I hope the verdict of this House will be so conclusive to-day that at leastwe will hear no more of these claims during this session.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to weary the House. I have had these claims under consideration for ten years. You could not put the papers in respect to them in a cart, and after all it is a simple question. No one asserts that these people have not been paid their contract price and extras put on by the Government. They are all settled. There should be no confusion of ideas about that. They come here because of the delay of the Government, whose naval officers in the early days of the war did not understand the construction of vessels. That has been admitted by the Department and there has been an official record made of it, that Steimer and other men did not understand their business and these boats had to be rebuilt. Some of them put under contract at the beginning of the war were not finished in 1864. Now, what did the Selfridge board find? What did the Marchand board find? That on account of the delay of the Government, and through no fault of these men, the rapid rise in wages and in material at the time these boats were constructed had bankrupted these men.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not this the question, as to whether or not the Government is prepared to make good to contractors the depreciation in the currency, in the greenbacks, that occurred between the date of the contract and the date of its completion? Is it not true that there was no appreciation in wages or in materials, measured by gold, but that the seeming rise was the result of a depreciation from 100 cents to 40 cents on the dollar? Is not that the question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; I will be frank in answering you, starting with the original proposition, that if these boats had been finished at the time that the contract called for their completion, this loss would never have occurred. Every gentleman in the House who is familiar with these matters knows that. Now, I do not care from what cause, whether from the rise in the price of gold, which forced up the price of labor and materials, or from what other cause, the whole fault absolutely was upon the shoulders of this Government. Now, what was the result?

Mr. GIBSON. And the Government paid these men in greenbacks?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; the Government paid these men in greenbacks.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question? When the soldiers went into the Army, they expected a short war. The war of the rebellion was protracted for four years. Now, is not every soldier who was paid his $13 a month in gold in the early days of the war, and later paid in greenbacks worth 40 cents, in precisely the same position; and has he not precisely the same claim to reimbursement that these men have because of the prolonged period of their contract?

Mr. MAHON. No; it is not an analogous case. The gentleman from Iowa and myself enlisted for a certain term. When that term was up we were paid in currency. I think we all came out bankrupt at that time. At least, I did. We had not anything when we went in, and we had not anything more when we came out. Now, I enlisted again for three years. I knew exactly what I was doing, and the Government kept good faith with me. When my time was up it gave me my discharge and gave me my pay.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. While we are talking about that, why do not you bring in a bill that gives to the old soldiers the difference between gold and greenbacks?

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman can bring it in if he wants to.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want you to do it. You are chairman of the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say, with all kindness to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY], he admits that he has only read one report. And I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama and others who oppose these claims that the simple issue is whether the Government shall repay these men their loss on their contracts through the fault of the Government. That is the whole issue. Now, what has become of them? It is well known that the Government said to these men, "Build these ships or we will take your yards." That is the record of your Navy Department. Now, why do I advocate these claims? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has paid me the compliment, as chairman of the committee, to say that I have always been fair to the people. I am one of the men who believe—and I am sorry this Congress, as a rule, does not—that when this great Government of ours inflicts an injury upon one of its citizens, it is great and rich enough to make that injury whole; and I would not give a continental for a government that would refuse to do it.

I do not know one of these claimants except an old lady in her eighty-ninth year, with her daughter alongside of her, 70 years old, who appealed to me. But it is a fact that through the fault of this Government nearly seven-eighths of these contractors went into bankruptcy. Who were they? When this war was thrown upon this Government, preparation was made like a flash of lightning. We had no Navy, and these men who took these contracts were among our best citizens, loyal to the core, patriotic, doing their best to put the machinery of war on the waters in order that the rebellion might be conquered. We did conquer; and when the war was over these men were all bankrupt. I have studied this question long enough to assert here without fear of successful contradiction that through the fault of this Navy Department—not the willful fault, but through its want of experience in constructing vessels—these men were made bankrupt. It was the fault of the Department that this happened. Now, that injury has been perpetrated. The gentleman from Illinois says these claims are forty years old. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is not a claim in this bill that is not gray-headed. They are war claims. All of them originated during the civil war.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has spoken about these claims. I have helped to pay his claims and voted for them in committee and on the floor of this House when I thought they were right. I want to say to him that 52 per cent of all the money paid by the Government in the way of war claims has been paid, and properly paid, to the storm-swept State of Tennessee. Gentlemen, I lived in a war territory. You may talk about the Filipino war, you may talk about other wars, but when that war closed in 1865 my people had been almost swept from the face of the earth. I know something about it. Some of these gentlemen who oppose these claims lived thousands of miles away from the seat of war.

Now, who are the opponents of these claims? I just want to refer to one matter. I make no reflection upon any gentleman in this House. I can honestly say that so far as I am concerned no lobbyist has ever approached me upon the floor of this House in favor of these claims, but some of the most vicious and infamous lobbyists that this city has known have been hanging around the corridors of this Capitol for the last two months, and have been assailing these claims by circulars infamous in their character, and assailing these vessel contractors. What interest have they in it? They have tried to create a false impression about these claims simply because, like vultures, they could not get their beaks into the appropriations that are likely to follow. It is not the people who own these claims, but it is the gentlemen who want to get large concessions from these people; and because they have failed, they have assaulted these claims in a manner that should exclude them from this Capitol.

Mr. CANNON. A single question. There are vultures in the world, but before they ever perform there has to be the presence of carrion. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. That is not always the case. They very seldom get carrion and have to take other food that people ought to have. The gentleman talks about conference reports coming back from the Senate and having to take the items that they put on. Many and many a time I have sat here during the night, and while we have been waiting through the night we have amused ourselves by singing old national songs and some of the Confederate songs, and under the leadership of the sweet singer now in the chair we have spent the long hours waiting on the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee of conference, and yet no instructions were given; and many a time the Senate has put into his bills something that he could not get them to recede from, and he had to agree to them.

Mr. CANNON. These claims, and many just like them, time and again have been put upon some of my bills; but the House has always stood by me, and they always went off.

Mr. MAHON. Except in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. In the Fifty-fourth Congress they put two millions on, and the bill passed the House and passed the Senate, and some gentleman opposed to them went to the White House and got President Cleveland to veto the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the President vetoed the bill.

Mr. MAHON. I know who went out to the White House and got him to do it [laughter]; but that is all right. I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, to instruct the conferees on the part of the House to resist what is known as the Selfridge board claims.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MAHON. Division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take up the time of the House by a further division.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14046, the title of which will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, to strike out the paragraph beginning at line 3, page 4, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $100,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Emergency fund" to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1902, and until such time as Congress shall make specific appropriation for the pay of such employees.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to the provision on the preceding page—the contingent fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to the last paragraph on page 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 4, line 2, after the word "dollars," to insert the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 2, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"And that the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $10,000 made in the act approved June 7, 1900, to enable the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps who die or who are killed in action, ashore or afloat, outside of the continental limits of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, made available until used."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in explanation of the amendment which has just been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be inserted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 3, 1902.

SIR: In the naval appropriation act approved June 7, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 685), under the head of "Pay, miscellaneous, contingent, Navy," the sum of $10,000 was provided "to enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps who die or are killed in action, ashore or afloat, outside of the continental limits of the United States."

Only about one-half of this sum, it is understood, has been expended. The remainder, however, is not available, the Comptroller of the Treasury having decided that the appropriation expired with the fiscal year 1901; and although that officer is now, at the instance of this Department, further considering the question of the availability of the unexpended balance for the purpose intended, I am advised informally that his present view is that the appropriation is an annual one, but that inasmuch as it was entered in the digest of appropriations as "indefinite," it may be used for the payment of such expenses as have already been incurred thereunder, but not for any that may hereafter be incurred.

Requests are frequently received from persons whose relatives in the Navy and Marine Corps have died abroad, particularly in the Philippines, that the bodies be brought home for burial; and while the Department believes that their wishes in this respect should be carried out, compliance therewith at this time is impracticable, owing to the lack of an appropriation. This want, it is thought, will for the present be adequately met by making available the unexpended balance of the appropriation above referred to, and I have the honor, therefore, to recommend the enactment of legislation to that end. For the convenience of the committee the draft of a proposed clause, suitable for insertion in the naval appropriation bill and designed to effect the desired object, is accordingly herewith submitted and commended to favorable consideration.

Very respectfully, WILLIAM H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Outfits on first enlistment: Outfits for all enlisted men of the Navy on first enlistment, other than naval apprentices, hospital apprentices, and landsmen under training for seamen, 3,000 men, at $45 each, $135,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. This seems to be a new item?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, is it new to the service or is it an appropriation that dwelt elsewhere?

Mr. FOSS. No; it is new to the service.

Mr. CANNON. Well, authorized by legislation?

Mr. FOSS. For the first time in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. It is legislation, then, as well as appropriation?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, I would be glad to ask my friend why? If I understand it, it is $45?

Mr. FOSS. Forty-five dollars for each man.

Mr. CANNON. For an outfit they never before have had?

Mr. FOSS. They never before had it.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to know why the committee find it necessary, if it is necessary.

Mr. FOSS. This outfit of $45 provides two suits of blue and two suits of white and underclothing accordingly to the enlisted men. Heretofore they have not had this, and this provision is made upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Bureau of Navigation. As it is at the present time, a man when he enters into the service of the Navy receives about $15 or $16 a month, and he is obliged to pay back this $45 for outfit which is advanced to him.

During that time, say for three or four months, he is not able to enjoy any of the privileges, such as going ashore, and very frequently he becomes dissatisfied with the service and deserts. Members of Congress are frequently called upon to help him out of trouble. Now, the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation believe that men who are enlisted in the service would become better contented with their lot, and at the same time it will be an incentive to enlistments of a better and higher class of men, if they are given this inducement. It practically amounts to an increase in salary of $45 a year. I may say to my colleague that the Army provides for outfits for its men, and that was another reason which was taken into consideration by the committee.

Mr. CANNON. This puts the seamen that are enlisted upon all fours with the Army.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; with the Army.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I would be glad to ask—and I am asking for information—a little later on we come to the naval training school. When seamen are enlisted all their expenses are paid when they go to the training school.

Mr. FOSS. The training schools are not for these men. They are for the boys—the apprentices. The seamen at the present time are trained on ships and not trained at shore stations.

Mr. CANNON. And it is not contemplated that they will be.

Mr. FOSS. There was a proposition coming from the Department to provide for three training stations for enlisted men, but the committee, after considering the question, determined not to establish these stations, but simply have the training stations for boys. The boys enter between 15 and 17 years of age, and too young, really, to go to sea until they have been sufficiently disciplined or seasoned, so to speak, for sea service. There are no training stations in this bill for men, but simply for boys.

Mr. CANNON. Unless it be for officers. However, I will speak of that when we reach it a little later on. I am glad to know that the Committee on Naval Affairs—I think I am glad, but I am not sure—concluded not to have training stations for seamen because they would be upon land. I am very much of the belief, without being much of a sailor, that a good place to train seamen is on the sea. [Laughter.] I have no desire to antagonize this. The committee was unanimous; it met with the judgment of the committee?

Mr. FOSS. Oh yes; the committee was unanimous. The policy of the committee is to keep the Navy out on the sea, and for that reason we saw fit not to recommend the establishment of other training stations, although the request came to us with a great deal of pressure from the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Naval training station, Rhode Island: Maintenance of naval apprentice training station, Coasters Harbor Island, Rhode Island, namely: Labor and material; buildings and wharves; dredging channels; extending sea wall; repairs to causeway and sea wall; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wharfage, ferriage, and street-car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same; fire engines and extinguishers; boats and gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentices; printing outfit and materials and maintenance of same; heating, lighting, and furniture; books, tools, and necessary appliances for petty officers' school; stationery, books, and periodicals; fresh water, ice, and washing; freight and expressage; packing boxes and materials; postage and telegraphing; telephones and all other contingent expenses, $55,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here are two items for the support of naval training stations, one at Newport, substantially, as I understand it, and another at Yerba Buena. I should like to ask the gentleman where is Yerba Buena?

Mr. FOSS. In San Francisco Bay.

Mr. CANNON. The report that the committee makes accompanying the bill, from a hasty glance at it, it would appear that the expenditure at Newport for this naval training station is $496,000, and then comes an appropriation of $55,000 for maintenance. Then there comes later on under public works, $114,000 for additions to this training school. It seems, also, that in degree there is something of the same kind for the training school in California.

Over on page 8 there is also a naval war college that I will not speak of except incidentally until we reach it, down at Newport. There is a pretty large expenditure for maintenance for that and for additions. In the meantime the bill carries quite a large amount for the building and repair of ships. I will ask the gentleman if his committee has given very close investigation to the naval training schools? It seems to me like the Navy, and to some extent the Army, is to go pretty largely into the common-school system, and we are to have education galore instead of fighting and manipulation of the Army upon the one hand and the Navy upon the other.

I will confess that I am not fully informed about it, but still the question arises in my mind as to whether after all we are not going too far in this kind of expenditure, and in the greatest good faith I ask the gentleman about it.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to ask the gentleman to point out these items of expenditure to which he refers.

Mr. CANNON. The report that the gentleman makes, I think on page 36, gives the value of the property at the naval training school at $496,000. Then there is something for machinery, which I do not happen to have before me—probably $100,000 or over. Then on page 36 of the bill there is $114,000 to further extend buildings; whether it be officers' quarters or what I am not clear. I have a surmise that it largely abounds in quarters for officers, who I presume are to instruct these people. I will be entirely frank with the gentleman. I will just ask him his opinion in this connection whether or not the proximity of the fashionable watering place of Newport has anything to do with the naval war college, or that we will come to in the next paragraph, the naval training school and the officers' quarters, if it be officers' quarters that are to be constructed?

I will ask my friend a little later on, if it is appropriate, how many officers are on shore and how many are at sea? I do not think that he and I would disagree as to what is the better policy to be pursued, and I do not know but that even by these surmises I may be doing great injury to the service which we all glory in. If my surmises are correct, then it becomes a somewhat serious question, while we are availing ourselves of our magnificent personnel in the Navy, whether they are not working us quite lively for matters which are not strictly connected with the Navy.

Mr. FOSS. Well, so far as the location of this training station is concerned, I would say to my honored colleague that I presume—in fact, I know—that it was established after the city of Newport was established. But the advantages of a naval station located at that point are, I think, quite evident. I have visited the naval training station. When I was there last I found more than a thousand boys being trained there—a thousand apprentices—and the appropriations which we have made from time to time have been comparatively small. Take this item, for instance, for maintenance, $55,000 per year. This, I think, is an increase of $10,000 over the appropriation of last year. But that is due to the fact that we have more boys there at this time than we had then, and is also due to the fact that there has been established a petty officer's school in connection with it.

Now, it is quite essential that we should train our officers, and that we should train these young boys, on shore to some extent. The Navy of to-day is different from the Navy of forty years ago. We can not measure the needs and necessities of the Navy to-day by the yardstick of forty years ago. The evolution of the modern battle ship brought about a wonderful change. The "Jack Tar" who was the inspiration of Cooper's tales has become a tradition. Old Jack, with his rough exterior, with language largely of profanity, sitting and smoking his pipe—perchance squirting tobacco juice with greater accuracy than the trained gunner of to-day can hit his mark with shot or shell—has become a tradition. "Jack" went off the ship when sails went off, and when masts went off. He went off in the evolution of the modern battle ship. And in his place has come the trained machinist, the trained gunner, the trained seaman; and it requires education to train these men to man the ship and to perform the different duties in connection with the careful manning and officering of the ship, in view of the great complexity of machinery and mechanism which obtains in our battle ships. And so this in some measure is a reason why it has become necessary to some extent to train apprentices and to train officers on shore.

But I would say to my colleague [Mr. CANNON] that we have not gone to the full extent which the Navy Department would have us go in training men on shore, because we have believed we should, as far as possible, keep the men at sea. But we think we are to-day doing no more of this training, this so-called education, than is absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the service.

A few members of the committee, including myself, have visited the naval training stations. We have only two—one at Newport and the other at Yerba Buena Island, in San Francisco Bay—and the appropriations for these naval stations have been reasonable from year to year and comparatively small in amount. The whole investment in each of them is not very large. Gentlemen refer to the one at Newport, which, I think, has cost us less than $500,000. That is the larger training station of the two; there are more boys there than at the other.

Now, I think with this information this provision ought to pass the judgment of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I will rise to oppose the amendment. Now, let us take up this question in connection with Newport. Turning to the statement on page 7 of the report of the committee, we find that there is at Newport, R. I., a naval torpedo station, with "real estate and chattels" valued at $245,000, and machinery $59,000.

Mr. FOSS. That is separate and apart from the training station.

Mr. CANNON. I know; but somehow or other there comes now for the support of this torpedo station an appropriation of $65,000 on page 12 of the bill. Then there is the naval training station; and then comes the War College. Now, we have about 12,000 or 15,000 miles of coast line. I will just ask my friend the plain direct question, if he knows whether or not the happening of these three institutions—the War College, the training station, and the naval torpedo station, all centered down there at Newport—whether the officers and men are on duty the year round or only during the warm season, and whether the schools vary in size; or, to make a long story short, if my friend knows, I would be glad to have him tell us how many officers there are there and about how many apprentices; and just between us now, is this a polite way of taking an outing at a summer watering place? Is this matter accidental, or is it on purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the superior facilities at Newport in the way of location and depth of water had a great deal to do with the selection of the place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire it.

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, yes; we want to have the gentleman's views on these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire further time?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. But I should like to know how many of these officers there are, because we are to come to this naval-college matter in a moment, and perhaps we had better understand it now.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Illinois. I would like to ask whether the gentleman is opposed to these institutions per se or opposed only to their location?

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend will allow me two minutes to answer him. I am in entire touch with the utterances of one who seems to me to be a man of great ability, holding a great place, of very recent date, and I read as follows:

> Even in time of peace a war ship should be used until it wears out, for only so can it be kept fit to respond to any emergency. The officers and men alike should be kept as much as possible on blue water, for it is there only they can learn their duties as they should be learned, etc.

I have read from the message of President Roosevelt to this Congress in December last.

Mr. WATSON. I think that is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, we might just as well have it out right here. The next item is the Naval War College. What is that for?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Instruction of officers.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know if the Naval War College is for the instruction of officers?

Mr. DAYTON. May I answer the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. My question is asked in good faith.

Mr. DAYTON. I know that and I want to answer the question of the gentleman. If the gentleman will take occasion some time at his leisure to read the hearing No. 63, in reference to this war college, I think he will find out that some of us were impressed with the same ideas that he had, and had a purpose to inquire pretty fully into what this war college was established for. I have not time to read that whole statement, but I will try to give him the substance of what is done at the Naval War College. It is an institution established for the purpose of the study of the arts of war, of military rules and actions, by the officers of higher grades.

In other words, it is the study of the art of war by those who are about to or have assumed commanding rank. Its purpose further is to study and to educate officers in all questions of international law. It is recognized to-day as the leading college on international law in this country, if not in any other country. Now, let me illustrate just what the class of studies there are in one particular. Problems are studied every year. It is supposed that war should spring up between this country and some other country and that its basis of action should be at a certain point. All the charts are studied, all the plans of that campaign are worked out in detail by these officers who are there present.

They are carefully preserved. There are hundreds of cases, many cases involving a naval campaign at almost every point on our coast, and in all parts of the world, in fact, and all the details of a plan of campaign under those circumstances are considered by the officers at this Naval War College for the purpose of determining what would be the action of each of the sides engaged in the controversy and what preparations would be made. In addition to that, the charts of the locality are carefully studied, and all, as I said a moment ago, of the details of the campaign are worked out, so that if we should have war with any one of the powers that would involve any question similar to that, the consensus of opinion of a number of the best officers, those of the higher rank, as to what should be the course and conduct of that campaign will be all worked out there in detail. That is in substance the purpose of it.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend how many officers attend this Naval War College?

Mr. DAYTON. Well, the number varies. Last year there were 28 of them that joined and worked out the scheme of what might be a possible war.

Mr. CANNON. How long were they on duty?

Mr. DAYTON. They were on duty six months, I suppose. I do not know; possibly less. They were studying these problems.

Mr. CANNON. During the summer season or in the winter time?

Mr. DAYTON. The school goes on in the winter time and in the summer also.

Mr. CANNON. Well, mostly in the summer time or mostly in the winter?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not think there is any difference.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask my friend another question. These people that attend this Naval War College are the highest officers, are they not?

Mr. DAYTON. Above the rank of lieutenant-commander, usually; those who are about to assume and be responsible for and command vessels in case there should be war.

Mr. CANNON. A lieutenant-commander is generally about 50 years old before he gets his commission, is he not?

Mr. DAYTON. Less than that now.

Mr. CANNON. Well, 40 or 45.

Mr. DAYTON. Well, I do not know what the age may be. It depends a great deal upon circumstances.

Mr. CANNON. I will assume him to be 45 or 40 for the purposes of the argument. To begin with, we will soon have an $8,000,000 Academy finished down here at Annapolis, with a six years' course, I believe, is it not?

Mr. DAYTON. No; four years, and two at sea.

Mr. CANNON. Well, we call it a six years' course.

Mr. DAYTON. But it is only four years at the Academy.

Mr. CANNON. Of education in the Naval Academy.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And the man goes to sea. About a third of them, as I recollect the last report a year ago, were on shore duty. And he goes along and finally gets his grade in peace and war, performing his duty on the great battle ships and the cruisers until he gets to be 40 or 45 years old. Then he comes back and goes upon shore duty and in the summer and the winter both, if you choose, but anyhow at Newport, he goes to this Naval War College.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope I can have a minute or two more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAYTON. Now, will the gentleman pardon me just one remark?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. I would be in entire sympathy with my friend in combining these colleges at Annapolis if that were possible. Unfortunately these institutions have been located at Newport. At one time it was suggested, and there was a strong sentiment in favor of it, that the Academy be moved from Annapolis to Newport, because I may assure the gentleman that there is no question that the surroundings—I do not mean the social surroundings, but I mean simply the harbor and the physical conditions—at Newport are very favorable to naval institutions of this character. The torpedo station is situated on an island that is entirely separated, as I understand it, from the city proper; but these institutions have been located there.

Now, I hope the gentleman will read the hearings for the purpose of determining the purpose and object of this naval war college and these other institutions. If he will do so, I think he will see that there is justification, not alone in having men understand the management of a ship at sea, but also in having them study every inch of our coast line, study every one of our harbors, study every possible contingency that may arise in a naval conflict in those harbors and in those waters, and study all the questions of how they shall obtain supplies, where the base of supplies shall be, and how a commanding officer shall prepare himself in case it should come upon him to be in charge of the fleet in time of battle there, and that is what they study.

Mr. CANNON. That is, about eighteen or twenty of them.

Mr. DAYTON. Every year. All of them get that training. There are only seven there permanently.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, seven there permanently.

Mr. DAYTON. Only seven there permanently in charge of the station.

Mr. CANNON. And as high as eighteen or twenty in the summer.

Mr. DAYTON. Last year, twenty-eight.

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-eight?

Mr. DAYTON. As they come on shore to study these problems.

Mr. CANNON. And they are all men over 40 and most of them over 50 years of age, drawing on blackboards what they would do in the event there was a breach presentation or a head presentation, and so on.

Mr. DAYTON. All these plans of war or conflict are carefully preserved for use in the library, and are strictly confidential.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will just turn over to page 37 of the bill and ask my friend what is this appropriation for?

Naval War College, Rhode Island, buildings: Building and furnishing a fireproof annex to the college, with a covered connecting bridge, $60,000.

Mr. DAYTON. I will simply answer the gentleman that this fireproof building is for the purpose of keeping these records, that are confidential in their character, and the other valuable papers that this college has.

Mr. CANNON. Then I understand that they have naval quarters there for these officials?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, no; I think not.

Mr. CANNON. For the seven people?

Mr. BULL. If the gentleman will allow me, they have about thirty or forty naval officers there at every session of the war college.

Mr. CANNON. Have they quarters?

Mr. BULL. Only for the president. The officers are quartered in the city of Newport.

Mr. CANNON. Quartered in the city of Newport. Does the Government own the quarters there?

Mr. BULL. No, sir; the Government owns the college building.

Mr. DAYTON. They live in four rooms in the college building, I want to say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I just wanted to see whether or not this was leather and prunella and an excuse, or whether there was real service in this Naval War College. Now, I want to express the belief of a man who does not know much about the sea, that you may take men who have been at sea until they are 45 years old, and then bring them together in a Naval War College to study what they might, could, would, or should do if a battle should come, and in my opinion, modestly expressed, it does not amount to the snap of a finger. Why, I had a friend once who told me that he took a whole month in posturing and seeing which knee he should get down onto, and trying to find out which hand of his sweetheart he should seize, and how low he should duck his head when he popped the question. "Well," said I, "how did you get along, Jim?" Said he, "By jing, I forgot all about it, and I asked her if she would marry me and kiss me, and she said 'Yes.'" [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I do not believe, gentlemen——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you think because you understand all these things that the average American youth does not have to be educated up to the point? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I would say, from the complexion of my good friend, that it did not take any war college to enable him to get along in all these emergencies. [Laughter.]

Now, as to the serious side of this matter. It is easy to find fault. I have been in this House too long to find fault recklessly, and I guard my words while I talk for a minute or two. Now, the surmise arises in my mind whether or no the greatest threat to the American Navy to-day is not the fact that one-third of the 1,700 or 1,800 officers are not upon salt water, but upon the land, in the performance of duty, in many instances, that civilians should perform.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. But my friend took nearly all of my time.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I am quite in harmony with the recommendation of the President of the United States that no naval officer, with the growing Navy, should be performing duty anywhere upon shore that a civilian can perform.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, only one moment. I want to ask my friend where these men are at work and what are they doing on shore.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, my friend, you will find, down at the Navy Department, quite many of them there. I will refer my friend to the Navy Register for that, and the report of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am really anxious to find out.

Mr. CANNON. I have got a report made a year or two ago that gives it, and my friend in charge of the bill says it is in his report.

Now, then, in the greatest good faith, without any demagogy about Newport, or this or that or the other, because I have a pride in the personnel of the American Navy; but we are building more ships here. This bill mounts up to $70,000,000, and I am in favor of building more ships. I am in favor of having a Navy that will answer the purposes of the Republic, and will stand sufficient for the new duties that have been growing, and have been thrust upon us in the performance of our duties to the nations of the world; strengthening our diplomacy and making us ready for any emergency. But I do believe that it is the duty of this committee, and our duty as friends of the Navy, to see to it that the President's recommendations are carried out. And we are going to have more officers, when we are enlarging the institution at Annapolis. I believe we should utilize the naval officers upon the sea. Now, then, I have laid the foundation for the statement by the various inquiries that I have made. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to indorse very heartily what he has stated in reference to keeping our naval officers upon the sea, and I wish to suggest to him how he can accomplish that result. If he will adopt the suggestions of the Secretary of the Navy who has just retired, and will induce his colleagues upon this side of the Chamber and upon the other side of the Chamber to carry into execution those suggestions, he will favor the consolidation of bureaus that in my judgment are cumbersome and some of them unnecessary, and put three to four hundred officers upon the sea and give no further excuse for keeping them on the land.

Mr. DAYTON. How can we send three or four hundred more officers to sea when there are less than three hundred on land?

Mr. WHEELER. There are between seven and nine hundred officers off on shore leave and on land duty.

Mr. DAYTON. There are 272.

Mr. FOSS. There are 1,017 altogether.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to conclude this sentence. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAYTON. We have only 1,017 officers altogether.

Mr. WHEELER. There were seven hundred and some odd ashore last year.

Mr. DAYTON. You are mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I believe in the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. If these bureaus in the Navy Department should be consolidated—I am not a naval expert, but I think I know, I believe I know it to the standpoint of absolute conviction, so that if I had the power to do it I would do it in the twinkling of an eye. [Laughter and applause.]

But let me state, gentlemen, that in my judgment it is not going to be done. Why? It is the easiest thing on earth to create an office. It is the hardest thing on earth, from a legislative standpoint, to abolish an office [laughter]; and when you come and talk about moving out the heads of these bureaus, and the naval officers that are in them, and sending them to sea through the consolidation and the employment of civilian people to perform the duties now committed to them, you strike "the sisters, the cousins, and the aunts" of all of us. [Laughter and applause.] And you are not going to do it. I wish it could be done. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. MUDD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to inquire if it would meet with the approval of the gentleman's views to provide that retrenchment, which I am always anxious to promote [laughter], if the establishment at Newport should be transferred to Annapolis and have it all at one place?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have always known the gentleman as an able leader and a faithful representative of his constituents. I am now glad to welcome him to the great society of humorists, and he is one of the best I know of. [Laughter.] Now, I do not want to grow into a common scold. I do believe it is impossible to do it in the Committee of the Whole House, but I do believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs, in vacation if necessary, should take hold of this whole matter with a vigorous grip. It is necessary for the good of the Navy, and twice necessary, in my judgment, for the good of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to attack in any way this particular provision with relation to the education of apprentices. I do not know how important it is, but I assume that it is important. I do, however, want to make some suggestions with reference to the extraordinary expense that this Government is at through, as I believe, the improper employment in a large degree, at least, of high-priced naval officers in the performance of a duty that ought to be performed by civilians. We have here a Navy Department, and it is a part of the civil government. Its object is for the control of the Navy of the United States, and yet in the Navy Department to-day in this city there are 114 naval officers, and within 40 miles of this Capitol there are to-day 204 naval officers, as shown by the last Navy Register.

We are all proud of the Naval Academy, and that pride was evidenced by the large, bountiful, munificent appropriations made only a year or two ago for the purpose of properly housing that establishment. It is supposed that that is a place for the education of naval officers, and the popular idea is that that education is being conducted as is the educational matters at other institutions. And yet we have there on duty now 59 naval officers, in addition to the professors and the others engaged in instruction in the scientific departments of that institution.

We graduated, I am told, 58 cadets at the last commencement. We have 59 officers there, one more than we graduated, and if you include the whole number of cadets you have but a little more than 4 cadets to each one of these officers. I believe there is something wrong about it. I think it ought not to be.

Let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the conditions there. At the Naval Academy we have 4 commanders, we have 14 lieutenant-commanders, we have 22 lieutenants, we have 13 lieutenants of the junior grade, we have 6 other commissioned officers, surgeons, pay inspectors, etc. We have 4 professors of mathematics, and we have 14 of the high-priced warrant officers.

Now, if this is necessary—if it is necessary to have this great staff in addition to the instructors that are there, all right; but if this is in accordance with the practice of finding comfortable places, secure corners and nooks where these gentlemen may be ensconced, I think it ought to be stopped.

One of the reasons which I would urge against the construction of ships in our navy-yards is that I believe that practice would simply justify on the part of officers controlling themselves in the Navy Department the flooding of these stations with unnecessary officers.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The very point the gentleman is now discussing has been in my mind many times, and having great confidence in the gentleman's wisdom as well as his experience, I would like to ask him a question. All these officers claim that they have a right to be at home during some period of their service. will my friend give me a plan which in his judgment would be wise, one by which they could be permitted to divide their time between shore and sea service? This is a proposition I have had in my mind a long time and I have not been able to satisfactorily work it out.

Mr. HEPBURN. The domestic arrangements of every man must be arranged by himself.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would my friend keep them at sea all the time?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think that the fact that a man has a family is a matter for his Government to consider, when it proposes to settle his pay and to provide for his duties. I know there was a time, for nearly four years, while I was in the military service of the Government, that no solicitude of that character seemed to be manifested on the part of the Government toward me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEPBURN. The question the gentleman from Pennsylvania has asked me I can not answer, and it is not for me to answer, nor for any other member of this House. That is a matter for each man to determine for himself. If he can not perform the duties that the Government has imposed upon him, the duties that he himself undertakes to perform, and hold proper relations to a family, that is his business, and not mine.

I believe that this idea that each man has a right, after a three years' cruise, to three years shore duty, is an assumption rather than a fact. He has no such right. He has no right to assume that the Government will recognize a right of that kind. I believe that when at sea—certainly during times of peace—there is no class of men receiving the same compensation who undergo so little of hardship and who have so snug and comfortable a berth as have our naval officers. [Applause.] I do not believe that three years' sea service is of such extreme and rigorous character—calls for such fortitude or self-denial—as to entitle the officer to three years of leisure afterwards. There is nothing like that "nominated in the bond."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow a single suggestion? It is also said in opposition to the arguments made by the gentleman from Iowa that to keep all these officers at sea will entail upon the Government an unusual expense; that it costs a great deal of money to keep a ship in commission; that there are certain times when a ship must be laid up for repairs; that our ships can not be at sea all the time, and our naval appropriations would be very much larger if we kept enough ships in commission to keep these officers of higher grade at sea all the time.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it is true that our ships do not keep pace in their growth with the growth of the Naval Register, then I would take some of the names off the Naval Register.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me a suggestion in the line of his remarks?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. The argument made for increasing the number of officers in the Navy Register is that we have not enough men to officer our ships, and therefore this bill provides for increasing the number by adding 500 more cadets.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was coming to that point after a time.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to say that I appreciate the gentleman's expressions, and agree with them.

Mr. HEPBURN. We have now 22 rear-admirals. We have not commands for them. On the contrary, we have proper commands for only 7 rear-admirals. According to this register, we have 70 captains to command ships; and yet as I read the register we have but 29 officers of that grade in command of ships.

I do not know that I want to make any other criticism than this, that the functions of the Navy Department, like those of the War Department, have been usurped, through usage, by a class of men that have no business there. Those offices in those two Departments are civil in their nature; they ought to be filled, at least in a large degree—except where expert knowledge is necessary—by civilians; and these men, trained to military or naval duties, ought to be placed where their education fits them for service.

I am told that it costs us $10,000 to graduate an officer at West Point or at the Naval Academy. After we have gone to that expense, why put these men in civilian places? Why put these high-priced men in situations which in the other departments are filled by $2,000 or $2,500 clerks? This practice will be continued just as long as the Navy Department is controlled by the Navy or the War Department is controlled by the Army. I do not believe a proper order of things will be possible until those two great Departments are restored to their proper places as part and parcel of the civil government of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much displeasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in opposition to the "shore duty" of the personnel of the Navy. I am very much in favor of shore duty for the Navy. It is my peculiar privilege to-day to defend the Navy, its honor, and its prestige, and its personnel. I may say that in a certain way I have an inherited duty to defend a certain class of the Navy—the landlubber part that stays ashore all it can. None of my family, except myself, have for six generations been "down to the sea in ships."

Now, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the performance of that duty I want to call the attention of the House to the time-honored fact that the "nine Muses" have always been the defenders of the heroes of land and sea battles. It is in poetry that the heroism of men appears to the best advantage. Half of the old worthies of the old time would have been lost sight of but for Homer. I want to read now a piece of poetry—a perfect piece of inspiration in my opinion—suggested by recent naval occurrences, which confirms the old idea that a man frequently owes his reputation to the inspiration of the Muses and to the comments that are made upon him by the worshipers at the altars of the Muses.

Who this worshiper is, who the author of these lines is, I do not know. I would scorn to inquire, because what he says is so absolutely perfect that his own "personnel" (to use a naval phrase) cuts no figure in the premises. You all remember that beautiful old-time poem about the battle of Blenheim and the glory of Marlborough and of Prince Eugene, and the little boy who wanted to know how it all came about. The author of these lines seems to have had that poem in his mind:

"Oh, who is Crowninshield, papa,
That he should have the best
Of everything there is to have
And shine o'er all the rest?"

"Great Crowninshield, my son, has done
A lot of wondrous things,
And now he reaps the proud rewards
That virtue always brings."

"What were the virtuous deeds he did,
That he should simply name
The things he wants for his rewards
And straight annex the same?"

"Oh, you can never understand
The wonders he has done;
The fight they made on Schley he planned,
And that was great, my son."

"What other fights were fought by him
Whose flag so proudly flies
High on our greatest ship, before
The world's admiring eyes?"

"No other sailor ever sat
Behind a desk and fought
As glorious a fight as that,
Or planned as grand a plot."

"But when and where did Crowninshield
Stand on the bridge and show
His 'bullies' how to train their guns
Against the firing foe?"

"Oh, fie upon your 'firing foes'
And 'bullies' and such things!
Great Crowninshield sat at his desk
And deftly pulled the strings."

"And was that all he did, papa,
That he, with bulging chest,
Should head the list of heroes now,
Eclipsing all the rest?"

"Go out and chase the put, my son—

I do not know what "put" is, unless it refers to the declaration that the American flag has "got to stay put," a highly ungrammatical but strenuously Presidential phrase; but I will leave the phraseology to the poet—

"Go out and chase the put, my son,
And bother me no more;
Great Crowninshield's the greatest tar
That ever stayed ashore."

[Laughter and applause.]

And yet the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], with that audacity that characterizes him, would deprive the heroes of the Navy of the opportunity of earning immortal and unending renown by "staying ashore" and "deftly pulling the string." Does he not know that a naval officer has no particular opportunity for promotion without an opportunity to "stay ashore" and "deftly pull the string?"

Mr. Chairman, it has not been long since the American people were somewhat aroused by a naval investigation of a man by the name of Schley, who took an insignificant part in the battle of Santiago.

The American people have concluded, without any reason, without any common sense, without any experience, contrary to all the expert knowledge of the Navy Department, that because this man simply happened to be on the bridge and happened to be telling the "bullies" how to shoot and whither to shoot, that he had something to do with the battle of Santiago. It just happened that a great "naval expert" by the name of Maclay wrote a history of the Navy of the United States, and it just so happens that that naval history was adopted at the Naval Academy at Annapolis—by whose insistence, by whose suggestion, I know not.

It just so happens that the author of the book mentioned, while he was writing it, in his introduction, says that he had had the proofs of the book submitted to this great "tar" who won his repute by "staying ashore," Crowinshield—or, as he is called since he went to England on coronation duty, Crunshell—and that he had it submitted to a great many other people connected with the last and with the present Administration, and that they approved of it. Now, this fool American people who do not know anything about naval affairs, and have not any particular sense, concluded that the man who happened to be there and in command of the ship that received the most shots and would have been sunk if it had not made the "loop," had a little something to do with the battle of Santiago, and a man in Congress, a fellow from down South—"away down South in Dixie"—who did not have any better sense, introduced a set of resolutions early in this Congress, which I will now read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, gentlemen, to quit badinage a while, let us just examine into what constitutes the right relationship between gentleman and gentleman and officer and officer in the Navy or in the Army of the United States. Suppose that I were a superior officer in the Navy or the Army. Suppose that I had reason to believe that an inferior officer had been cowardly or had been untruthful in his conduct, what would be my duty? To ask and to try to get a court-martial or to prefer charges against him for what he had done. Would it be a part of my duty to go out and pick up a little whippersnapper somewhere in the employ of the Government as a laborer, have him write something and look over his proofs and approve and indorse them, and have him make an attack in the rear upon my brother officer? I imagine not. I imagine that would be ordinarily considered "conduct unworthy of an officer and a gentleman."

Has that sort of conduct taken place? I do not know. Nobody knows. We do know it has been charged, and we do know that this Congress has absolutely failed to investigate it. Now, a Presidential ukase has been sent abroad that talk about this Schley matter must stop, in official circles at any rate. Thank God, they can not stop it amongst the American people altogether, provided the American people want to talk about it. But I have never wanted to investigate the Schley matter any further. That has been investigated sufficiently, and not only the American people, but the people of the entire world, with honest hearts and clear brains, have concluded that whatever else is true, that whatever else is false, one thing is true, and that is that Admiral Schley was neither a coward nor a liar. [Applause.] The American people know that, if he had never been in the battle of Santiago, his exploits upon the Greely relief expedition branded him a man all over, and a man with a courage much rarer than the courage which men must have in battle, because in battle the shoulder to shoulder feeling of men encourages the coward now and then, out of pure pride, to play the part of hero.

But when a man goes away up to the arctic circle upon one of these relief expeditions, and has to battle upon the hurricane deck of the ship against the wind and the cold, and has to take care of his men and keep his presence of mind about him, it requires a courage far above the "hurrah, here we go" sort of courage that takes place in battle.

This resolution was introduced. I want to call the attention of the House to it, and I want to know why it now sleeps the sleep of the just—and I will undertake to say that it is the sleep of the just—in the Committee on Rules:

Whereas—

Is there a word in it that is not true—

one E. S. Maclay has written a history of the Navy of the United States which was adopted for use at the Naval Academy at Annapolis—

Did he write it? Was it so adopted or not?—

And whereas in said history said E. S. Maclay denounces Rear-Admiral Schley as a liar and a coward—

Did he or did he not?—

And whereas said Maclay is reported to have alleged that the proof sheets containing these charges were submitted to one Capt. A. S. Crowninshield, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department, and approved and acquiesced in by him—

That was reported, was it not? Did you not all of you see it in the newspapers everywhere? It is merely asserted that it was so alleged—

And whereas said Maclay was at the time of the writing of the said history and is now—

He is not at this moment, but he was at the time of the introduction of these resolutions—

in the employ of the Navy Department of the United States, notwithstanding the scurrilous character of the charges made by him in said history;

And whereas said facts disclosed a state of things subversive of honorable conduct and consideration among officers of the Navy and employees of the Navy Department: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved—

Now what? No great bombshell, no anarchy, simply this—

That a committee be appointed by the Speaker for the purpose of investigating and reporting to the House of Representatives the truth or falsity of the said statements as made by said Maclay, the truth or falsity of the allegations that the proof sheets were submitted to and acquiesced in by said Captain Crowninshield, and to report to the House of Representatives the course of action to be pursued by the House in consequence of the ascertainment of facts to be made by said committee.

Gentlemen, I have heard a great deal here in the last two or three days about attacking the "honor of the Army" and attacking the honor of the Navy of the United States. We seem to have come almost to the point to which the French Republic came a little while back, when the civil authorities dared not acquit an innocent man for fear that the nation of France might meet with the rebuke of the army of France—in the Dreyfus case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to use the time allotted to me. I have heard a great deal here lately upon the line I have just referred to; but I want to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this, that an attempt to maintain the principles of humanity in the Army and an attempt to maintain and secure the principles that ordinarily prevail among gentlemen in the Navy is not an attack upon either the Army or the Navy. It is, upon the contrary, a defense of the historical and traditional esprit du corps of both.

I listened with much surprise yesterday to the remarks of my grave and reverend friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW]—a gentleman who has identified himself with the history of this country in more than one worthy way—when he undertook between the lines to justify Smith's inhuman order in the Philippine Islands "to make a howling wilderness of Samar," and "to kill all—10 years old or over," by citing what he said was the conduct of the Federal Army on Sherman's march to the sea and on Sheridan's trip through the Valley of Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, I am a Southerner, and I am a son of a Confederate soldier and a Confederate officer. He left me many broad acres, and he left me many things to render easy my course through life. He left behind him with me a heritage of love and affection; but he left me nothing, in my estimation, as valuable as the recollection of his courage upon the battlefield in meeting soldiers almost as brave upon the other side. Mr. Chairman, standing here as a Southerner and the son of a Confederate soldier, I hurl back the comparison made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Neither under Sherman nor under Sheridan, neither on the march to the sea, nor through the Valley of Virginia, while houses were being burned and stores and supplies were being destroyed according to the rules of war while many things were being done to prove true Sherman's remark, "War is hell"—and now and then contrary to them—neither on the march to the sea nor on the march through the valley was ever an order issued by a Union officer to make either place "a howling wilderness," nor to "kill everything," men and women, "above the age of 10 years." Neither upon the march to the sea nor on the trip through the valley of which Sheridan boasted afterwards, when he had gotten through with it, "that a crow must carry its own rations, if it wanted to cross it," did Union soldiers reduce themselves to the degradation of habitually committing rape and murder, nor any officer to the deeper degradation of ordering either.

It is not my ancestry that is slandered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; it is the ancestry of the Northern section of this country, if anybody. But as an American citizen, as the son of a "rebel" soldier, as a man who is intensely American, although he is intensely Southern, I want the world to know that when civilized men were fighting civilized men upon the American continent—one of them in behalf of the cause of the preservation of the Union as he understood it, and the other in behalf of the cause of local independence as he understood it—that the watchword was chivalry and fair fight, and that women were not subject to insult and rapine, and that boys were not murdered because they had reached the "age of 10."

Why, Mr. Chairman, have we reached the stage when the Army is greater than the nation, when the criminals in the Army can not be held up to the execration of the good men of the country? If we have, this cry, which has been uttered by some people, that the Republic had already ceased to exist and the empire and despotism had taken its place, is demonstrated by the very fact itself.

Why, away back years ago when you first embraced this newfangled theory of American expansion over non-American and un-American territory, when you began this newfangled scheme of extending the American flag where American principles could not go, when you began this new policy of annexing oriental and inferior populations and oriental countries, thereby poisoning the body politic by the admixture of their inferior blood or else tempting ourselves to deeds of tyranny or cruelty, I called your attention upon the floor of this House to what you would have to face.

The history of the white people all through the history of the world is written unerringly so that anyone may understand it. Wherever a higher civilized race comes into conflict with a savage race through the fact of war, the civilized power resorts to savage methods, provoked by the savage character of the foe whom it opposes. Opposing barbarians, they think themselves entitled to become barbarians. What is the lesson to be drawn from it? Go ahead and exterminate the savage foe or the semi-savage foe? No; the lesson is to keep yourselves within the limitations and boundaries which God has fixed for the races of the world, securing the happiness of your own people and admitting the independence and liberty of other peoples. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. GROW rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the fact that all this debate is practically proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak, not upon the vexed question of Schley or anti-Schley so much as to reply to the demand or challenge that was made to the Committee on Rules by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, who demanded to know why certain resolutions, with a series of preambles, had "slept the sleep of the just," I believe he termed it, in the Committee on Rules. I thought it proper to make a brief answer to that statement, inasmuch as it seems to be a sort of common purpose to assault the action of the Committee on Rules upon all occasions and to lay at their door any evil or disappointment that comes to a member of the House.

This resolution came to the Committee on Rules. Prior to that time Admiral Schley had made a request, or in the nature of a demand, for a court of inquiry to investigate the subject-matter of the dispute that was in the public mind in regard to the battle of Santiago and kindred topics, among which was the Maclay matter. That court had made an inquiry, had taken a vast volume of testimony, and had reported upon it. The verdict of the court was before the people of the country and it had been submitted to the Navy Department for approval or disapproval. Admiral Schley, with very able counsel, who had also appeared for him before the court of inquiry, went to the Department and filed exceptions to the report of the court.

A very elaborate and a very able presentation of his claim was made to the Navy Department, and the report of the Navy Department was made upon that appeal. Then about the time these resolutions, not far from the time—there have been so many of them that I can not give the exact date—Admiral Schley appealed to the President of the United States to set aside the finding of the court of inquiry and the approval of the Navy Department and to reexamine the question of facts, and made such an elaborate and able showing to the President that he decided not only to examine the entire record of evidence in the case, but upon a single question about which evidence was excluded by the court of inquiry the President saw fit to take the testimony of additional witnesses, as well as the original official reports of the battle and the campaign, and also the entire testimony taken before the court of inquiry.

Thereupon the President was considering these questions, and after a long delay, which seemed to involve a very careful examination of the whole subject, in which these ex parte arguments made by the counsel for Schley were considered, the President made his report, which went to the country. Thereupon Congress, either through the instrumentality of a single resolution of the House, or by concurrent resolution, or a joint resolution of the two Houses, ordered the printing of the entire testimony, all the briefs and arguments, as I recollect, all the appeals made in the case, first from the judgment of the original court of inquiry; second, the approval of the Navy Department to the President, and finally, the elaborate decision of the President himself. All these were ordered printed and are to be circulated in the country, the entire proceedings in relation to this vexed question.

I should also say that the man Maclay had been peremptorily driven out of the service of the United States by the President himself, and his book had been suppressed. Thereupon it was the unanimous opinion of those members of the Committee on Rules, so far as I remember, and so far as I heard expression, that portion of it that discussed the subject when I was present at least, that to make a report on these resolutions would be the unnecessary agitation of a most unfortunate question, a question that was giving the country more irritation than satisfaction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no recollection that the question of reporting this resolution was ever heard in the full Committee on Rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was about to ask if the two minority members of the committee were present.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Probably they were not. The gentleman from Alabama knows how business proceeds in the Committee on Rules [laughter], and those of us who have been longer here know how it has proceeded at other times, whether the House is Democratic or Republican.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman pardon me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Ohio know whether the President ever ordered any investigation to find out whether Captain Crowninshield ever indorsed Maclay's history?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. VANDIVER. What does the gentleman from Ohio mean when he says that Maclay's book had been suppressed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand so.

Mr. VANDIVER. How and in what way?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ordered not to be used in the Naval Academy. At any rate, public opinion had suppressed it.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman? I have here a letter signed by Commander Nicholson, of the Bureau of Navigation, which I would like to read:

I have just communicated with the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, and he tells me that the first and second volumes of Maclay's Naval History have been in use at the Academy for several years before the Spanish war. The third volume—

That is the volume to which the gentleman refers—never has been used, and it has never been the intention to use it, as, apart from its reference to Admiral Schley, it is considered unadvisable for the purposes of instruction at the Academy.

He also tells me that he doubts if there is even a copy anywhere in the library of the Naval Academy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a good specimen of about the whole of this trouble. The whole United States has been permeated and been impressed with the idea that the Navy Department was forcing upon the cadets at Annapolis this history of Maclay's. Now, it turns out that it is doubtful if there is a copy of the book there. And certainly none of this third volume has been used as a text-book.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman tell me why it was necessary to issue an order to prevent the use of the third volume of Maclay's history if it has never been used?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not appear that there was an order suppressing it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understood the gentleman to say that there had been an order issued.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The public had been informed by the Navy Department a long time before that the book would not be used. I do not know whether it was in the form of an order or not, but it turns out that it never was in use and that the third volume was never used.

Mr. FOSS. The first two volumes have been used there, and were used a long time before the Spanish war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand. Now, I want to finish my remarks. Some time in the future I may get into a discussion about the battle of Santiago, but it will be when I have nothing else to do. [Laughter.] I rose, Mr. Chairman, to give the reasons why the resolution was never reported. What was there to agitate this House about after all the facts I have stated? When every fact connected with it—not only the facts that were brought out before the court of inquiry, but all the facts that were brought to the knowledge of the Navy Department by the ablest counsel that could be procured in its behalf—and after all the supplemental facts were brought to the attention of the President, and which he immediately notified the world of by publishing the testimony, why should we have agitated and disturbed the peace of this House by a resolution that could have had no effect, except as a mere bombshell in the presence of the public—"mere sound and fury"—like the "tale told by an idiot—full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has been made and discussed pro and con. As the Chair stated a moment ago, all this debate for the last hour has been proceeding by unanimous consent. But it is not for the Chair to interpose any objection.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, in the few remarks I made yesterday, I did not depreciate the valor or the character of American soldiers at home or abroad. I attempted, however, in that very short speech to call to the attention of the House the rules of what is called "civilized warfare."

I remarked that there could not be war among men without more or less cruelty during war. I attempted to call attention very briefly to the condition of our citizen soldiers in the Philippine Islands. The population of the Philippine Islands consists of three classes: One, intelligent, educated, high minded, and of high aspirations; another class, not quite so well educated and with not quite so high aspirations in life; another class that belongs to the old Asiatic races that in warfare are cruel and brutal—a class that indulge in the old cruelties of warfare practiced by Asiatic races from the beginning of history.

The Army in the Philippines has had to deal mostly with this latter class. The first class has been friendly to Americans from the beginning. This third class, scattered through the islands in guerrilla bands, have made war upon their own countrymen who are in sympathy with the American people. From the cruelties and barbarities which they have committed upon their own countrymen, friends to Americans, the protection of our soldiers was needed quite as much as it was for themselves. They would have been regarded as false to humanity, false to the impulses of American citizenship everywhere, had they not protected their friends.

The military orders that gentlemen on the other side complain of as cruel have had that object in view as well as for the protection of American soldiers. It was to put an end to these barbarities—to these cruelties that belong to Asiatic warfare—perpetrated by this third class of the Philippine population. It was this class that committed the massacre at Samar of a part of the Ninth Regiment—the regiment that was one of the first to scale San Juan Hill and drive the Spanish soldiers from their intrenchments at the point of the bayonet—the great blow that ended on land the Spanish war.

Mr. Chairman, the duty of the commander of an army anywhere is to protect the lives of his soldiers. He is called upon in extreme cases to protect them against great barbarities by adopting, if necessary, great barbarities in retaliation in order to prevent or to put an end to great atrocities.

Neither the gentleman from Mississippi nor any other gentleman can point to any order or any rumor of any order ever issued in the Philippine Islands by any American officer for the murder of women and children, as told in the stories that we have heard repeated here almost every day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman admit that persons 10 years of age are children?

Mr. GROW. Where?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the Philippine Islands, or anywhere.

Mr. GROW. If the "children" have arms in their hands and are acting as soldiers what does it matter if they are only 10 years old?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If my baby had a pistol in his hand would he not still be a baby?

Mr. GROW. If your baby did not kill anybody he would not be hurt. [Laughter and applause.] If a person, no matter how young in years, turns assassin and kills like men, what would you do with him? Would you go and pat him on the head and play "pussy cat" with him?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit one interruption?

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have never complained that Filipinos with guns in their hands in battle, whether they were 10-year-old boys or women, were shot. But the complaint is that an order was issued against the general Filipino population, including persons only 10 years old, whether they had guns in their hands or not.

Mr. GROW. We have no information that such order has ever been issued. You can not find it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I refer the gentleman to the declaration of the counsel of General Smith.

Mr. GROW. The massacre at Samar was committed upon unarmed soldiers. They could have been taken as prisoners of war, but they were killed by men who massacre prisoners and bury people alive whom they regard as their enemies. How are you to deal with such people? How are you to deal with barbarians when they are prosecuting a warfare upon our soldiers, unless you adopt what will prevent their barbarities? [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROW. Yes, if it is short.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman asks how are we to deal with barbarians. I answer, there was a Man in the world nineteen hundred years ago——

A MEMBER. He did not live in Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, Abraham Lincoln issued an order for the Union Army that was a retaliation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. GROW. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to the gentleman to take up my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROW. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Now, will the gentleman permit me one question? Of course I can understand the merriment on the other side of the Chamber when reference is made to the religion of Jesus Christ——

Mr. GROW. The merriment on this side of the Chamber was at my own mistake, not at the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman is too charitable. The merriment on the other side of the Chamber came from the gentlemen who think it is a matter to be laughed at on that side——

Mr. MAHON. Oh, that is the usual kind of talk we hear from that side.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I propose to occupy only a few moments, simply to repeat the substance of my few remarks made yesterday, that in all wars there is more or less brutality, and the commanding general, for the protection of his own soldiers, must adopt retaliatory measures in extreme cases, if he can do nothing else, to save their lives. There has been no order issued for the killing of women and children in the Philippine Islands. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi says that an order to kill 10-year-old boys with arms in their hands is an order against children.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I never said it was an order to kill 10-year-old children with arms in their hands. It was an order to kill all above 10 years old, with or without arms.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will permit me to go on in my own way, I will prefer it. The facts were proven before the committee on investigation that these 10-year old boys had killed American soldiers in this massacre, and that they were found in arms in the Philippine army, and they performed the acts of full-grown soldiers, so far as killing was concerned. Then, why should not an order apply to them?

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit an answer?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROW. Oh, I decline to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Will not the gentleman be so kind as to yield for a moment?

Mr. GROW. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I will ask the gentleman to explain to the House, in view of his statement, upon what the President of the United States based his order for the trial by court-martial of General Smith.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. To ascertain the facts.

Mr. GROW. He has placed everybody charged with making improper orders on trial.

Mr. WHEELER. What improper order did General Smith make?

Mr. GROW. It is reported he made, without sufficient excuse, an order to kill everybody with arms in their hands. If there was no excuse for retaliation that order would not be proper. If there was, it is just as proper as any other order.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman be kind enough——

Mr. GROW. The gentlemen will permit me to finish. An order to prevent barbarity in extreme cases is just as proper as any order under civilized warfare. The lives of the soldiers must be protected, if possible, by his commanding officers from cruel massacre. It is the duty of the officer in charge, if necessary, to put an end to barbarities and atrocities, if necessary to do so by retaliation, recognized everywhere under the rules of civilized warfare. That is all I said yesterday, not that Americans were perpetrating willful and unnecessary brutality anywhere. In warfare it is unnecessary to burn the homes of unarmed and peaceable citizens. Yet in our civil war they were burned on both sides, and nobody arrayed the armies for that. It is one of the incidents of warfare. You can not help it. When Sheridan went up the Shenandoah Valley and some of his soldiers were killed by shots from dwellings on the roadside, and it could not be told which it was, he ordered the inhabitants out of the houses and burned them in his rear. The soldier is under the protection of his officers, and when he is killed in a barbarous way the officer is justified in retaliating if in his judgment that is necessary for the protection of his soldiers against such assaults.

Before taking my seat I desire to express my thanks to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for his complimentary and kind reference to myself. What I wish to say now in conclusion is that in the Philippine Islands American soldiers have three classes of people to deal with; different in that respect from most wars. It is, as a rule, one class of people, with one set of ideas, habits, and civilization on one side, and another with the same habits and ideas. The same general rules will then apply to both sides. But when barbarous elements, such as do not exist anywhere outside of Asiatic civilization, are to be dealt with, then orders must be made in extreme cases in retaliation for great cruelties and barbarities perpetrated upon American soldiers in order to put an end to it, if the lives of the soldiers are not to be uselessly sacrificed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROW. Now, if the House will give me two minutes and gentlemen will let me alone, I should like it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. GROW. For two minutes uninterrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROW. Now, in this case we have had presented to us a long account of offenses committed by American soldiers. How did you get them? The War Department took notice of all these charges against our soldiers. They have been examined by the proper authorities, and now you come in here and parade all these cases where they have been convicted for all offenses that they ought to have been convicted for. The last cases to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers are now under examination by the President of the United States. He has to decide whether the order of General Smith was justifiable under the articles of war or not. As I understand it, under the then existing circumstances, it was justified, and that is what I said yesterday. If I was the commanding general, anywhere and barbarious atrocities were perpetrated upon the soldiers under my command, I would adopt a barbarism still greater, if possible, if there was no other way, in my judgment, to save the lives of my soldiers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 8106. An act granting an increase of pension to Daniel J. Mahoney.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13359. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance, for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5356. An act to establish an Indian agricultural school at or near the city of Wahpeton, in the State of North Dakota; and

S. 4825. An act to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me just two minutes?

Mr. FOSS. Not now. I prefer to proceed with the reading of the bill? We shall have more debate a little later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands the reading of the bill. If there be no objection the informal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to appoint a board composed of naval officers, whose duty it shall be to recommend a suitable site for a naval training station at some point on the shores of the Great Lakes or the waters connected therewith, and having recommended such site, if upon private lands, to estimate its value and ascertain as nearly as practicable the cost for which it can be purchased or acquired, and of their proceedings and action to make full and detailed report to the Secretary, who shall transmit such report, with his recommendations thereon, to Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order upon this paragraph, and will suggest to the gentleman that if it meets his approval, we might pass it over and return to it. I should like to look into the matter a little.

Mr. FOSS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to pass over the paragraph which has just been read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be necessary for the Clerk to read another paragraph in order that there may be anything to strike out. We have just passed over the last paragraph by unanimous consent. If the gentleman will wait until we have read another paragraph, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval War College, Rhode Island: For maintenance of the Naval War College on Coasters Harbor Island, and care of grounds for same, $8,000; one draftsman, at $1,200 per year; general repairs to woodwork, etc., minor alterations in quarters, and necessary renewals of furniture, $2,000; installing lightning protection for college building, $446.25; services of a lecturer on international law, to be immediately available, $1,000; services of civilian lecturers rendered at the War College, to be immediately available, $900; purchase of books of reference, $400; in all, $14,246.25.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I listened with very great attention to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a moment ago, but I failed to note in the gentleman's remarks the slightest attention paid by him to the object of the resolutions which I read. The object of those resolutions was to investigate the conduct of Captain Crowninshield. The gentleman from Ohio said not one word about that. I said that the object of the resolution was not to continue the Schley investigation: that the American people were satisfied about that.

It remains a fact that Maclay asserted, or is alleged to have asserted, that his proofs, calling Schley a coward, a caitiff, and a liar, were submitted to a brother officer and that that brother officer read the proof, approved of it, and encouraged the publication; and it remains a fact that these resolutions were introduced for the purpose of obtaining an investigation to find out whether or not that allegation was true, and that the Committee on Rules have buried the resolution, and the gentleman from Ohio has not one word to say about it. He seems to think that the resolutions were to investigate Schley. No; the resolutions were to investigate Captain Crowninshield, and he has never been investigated yet, and the President has never said anything about investigating, but has promoted him. I want to investigate, not Schley, but Schley's detractors. Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], and then I am done, as far as I am concerned, with this discussion.

In the impartial consideration of the members of this House upon both sides, is this not a fair and full statement of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, and is it not a full vindication of what I asserted, to wit, did he not say that when civilized man is engaged in warfare with barbarians he ought himself to become a barbarian. Is not that what he said? Is not that all he said? That whenever you were face to face with barbarity you were justified in resorting to barbarity? I leave that utterance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the sentiment, not of the Christian world alone, but to the sentiment of the civilized world everywhere, whether Christianized or not, and will rest assured of the result in the conscience of good men, gentlemen, and officers.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] has placed before the House and the country the whole gospel of conquest. What is the use of discussing whether we have carried on war against the Filipinos according to the rules of civilized warfare or not? Recalling the accounts of the battles in northern Luzon, when within the very shadows of Manila armed bands of insurrectos and our forces met in conflict, what did we learn from the published reports of the casualties? We learned that our forces were exterminating the natives.

The dispatches told us that a battle had been fought here or there; that so many hundred Filipinos had been killed, none wounded, and no prisoners taken, while a small number of American soldiers—sometimes one or two, never half a dozen—had been killed and wounded.

How have conquests been accomplished such as we have undertaken in the Philippines? Read the history of India prior to the Christian era, during the past four hundred years, for an answer to this question. Throughout each of a dozen invasions of that great Empire wholesale slaughter and horrible violence, creating a reign of terror, were the methods used, first by the Pagans and later by the Dutch, the Portuguese, the French, and the English in India. It is one chapter of terror in the land.

The same horrible means were employed by the Dutch in Java. For more than eight hundred years England has held Ireland by sheer violence. The same sad story records the conquest of Peru and Mexico by the Spaniards. The same appalling tragedy is being enacted in South Africa, and England justifies the horror by declaring that thus and thus only can she destroy the Boer republics. We are doing what Spain did in Cuba. Weylerism was justified by Spain on the ground that it was necessary. We can only justify the horrible means we are employing in the Philippines by declaring that it is necessary. It is the story of all conquests. We remain in this business with the understanding that when we attempt the conquest of a country with a numerous hostile population only barbarous methods will beat down opposition. If we are to remain masters of the Philippines—if the people over there are to be held as vassals—they can not be made to submit by means sanctioned by the laws of war.

What was the purpose of the order of General Smith ordering the slaughter of the people of the island of Samar? It was to create a reign of terror. It was to strike terror to the very hearts of the entire population of that unhappy island. The people were hostile to our Government. The only armed forces opposed to our troops were little bands of irregulars—guerillas—bandits, if you please. The people sympathized with these marauders—the remnant of the Philippine army. Some of our soldiers were killed by the Philippine guerrillas. To avenge their death the general in command of our forces ordered a bloody crusade against the inhabitants. While all the details are unknown, we know that the order was flagrantly at variance with the laws and usages of civilized nations. This is only the beginning. A hundred years from now the natives will be our deadly enemies and will oppose our sovereignty upon every favorable opportunity. We now hold the Philippines by force. To quiet active resistance and obtain what gentlemen would misname peace we must slaughter all who stand in our pathway—those with arms in their hands and all who may hereafter take up arms.

Since we began the war of conquest the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have progressed remarkably in the ways of imperialism. To-day a Congressman of the United States in attempting to justify the methods employed in the campaign in Samar begs the question by saying that if 10-year-old boys have guns in their hands an order to kill 10-year-old boys is lawful. It is nowhere pretended that General Smith ordered the slaughter of all who had guns in their hands, including 10-year-old boys. He issued an order for the indiscriminate slaughter of the population, regardless of whether they were armed or not. He did this on the assumption that the people, including 10-year-old boys, are uniformly hostile to our forces. He did it because he knew that unless prevented by a reign of terror they would upon every favorable opportunity rise in hostility against our troops and assail our forces. He did it upon the assumption that this hostility is so deep seated and determined in those people that in order to subjugate them we must make war upon even the children.

Now, let us go back a little way—a year or year and a half and two years ago—when this question was first under discussion. In reply to the charge that we were forcing American sovereignty upon the Philippines, the reply was that a majority of the Filipinos were in favor of American control of the islands. It was said that only one of the tribes was unfriendly to the United States.

Every speech made on this subject by Republicans in this House at former sessions of Congress contained the statement that only the Tagalogs, a single tribe, were opposed to the sovereignty of the United States. Now we are told that the hostility of the Filipinos is so deep seated that opposition to our rule is so irreconcilable that, in order to beat it down, it is necessary to issue an order to make war upon 10-year-old children. I grant you it is; and so it will be a century hence.

What is the first thing that is done when our forces enter a Filipino village? Do they find an armed force to contend with? No. No armed enemy confronts them. But here are some guns secreted about the village and these guns must be captured or sooner or later an armed band will be harassing our forces. The search for the guns can only be successful by employing brutal measures. The water-cure torture is resorted to to compel the natives to give up their arms. The natives are seized, interrogated, and tortured one after another until the information is obtained, and having disarmed that population our troops pass on to the next community, and the sickening performance is repeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. I should like to have about five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSS. I will have to object. I regret exceedingly to do so, but I desire to get on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman will notice that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had his time extended three times on a request made at least once on this side.

Mr. FOSS. I think the gentleman from Mississippi had the same courtesy extended to him.

Mr. COCHRAN. It seems to me that notice ought to be given before a speaker takes the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman will have had the last word, if he cares for that.

Mr. COCHRAN. Well, these things can be remembered by a man who has a memory.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa.: One superintendent of grounds, at $720; 1 steward, at $480; 1 matron, at $360; 1 chief cook, at $300; 1 assistant cook, at $240; 1 assistant cook, at $180; 1 chief laundress, at $192; 5 laundresses, at $168 each; 4 scrubbers, at $168 each; 1 head waitress, at $192; 8 waitresses, at $168 each; 1 kitchen servant, at $200; 8 laborers, at $240 each; 1 stable keeper and driver, at $360; 1 master at arms, at $480; 2 house corporals, at $300 each; 1 barber, at $360; 1 carpenter, at $845; 1 painter, at $845; 1 engineer for elevator and machinery, $900; 3 laborers, at $360 each; 3 laborers, at $300 each; total for employees, $13,770. Miscellaneous: Water rent and lighting, $2,100; cemetery, burial expenses, and headstones, $350; improvement of grounds, $780; repairs to buildings, boilers, furnaces, furniture, $8,000; music in chapel, $300; transportation of indigent and destitute beneficiaries to the Naval Home, $100; support of beneficiaries, $50,725; in all, for Naval Home, $76,425, which sum shall be paid out of the income from the naval pension fund.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The orders for the destruction of property and supplies issued by the commanders of the Union forces during the civil war furnish no precedent for the brutality with which some of our commanders in the Philippines stand charged. If the charge has ever been made that either a Confederate soldier or a Union soldier, acting in obedience to orders, made an assault upon or killed an unarmed noncombatant, I have never heard of it. Individuals may have done such things, but never in obedience to a general order of a responsible commander. Harsh measures were resorted to, but to say that any order issued during the civil war could be tortured into an order for the destruction of the population of a township or a county is absolutely absurd.

Why is it Republican leaders are driven to this desperate refuge? Would they besmirch the fame of the men who led the great armies from 1861 to 1865? Is this the only way in which they can hope to clear our skirts—I say "our," for we are all interested—of the infamy practiced in the Philippine Islands?

Lately an aggregation of representatives of all civilized nations assembled over in Holland for the purpose of promoting universal peace and settling the laws of war. It was known as The Hague conference. In that conference the very question now being dealt with by our generals in the Philippine Islands was under consideration. It was declared that where a country is invaded and the people spontaneously take up arms in its defense they are to be the judges of how long and in what manner they will oppose the invading army. They are held, of course, to the observance of the usages of civilized warfare; and this brings me to the consideration of a branch of this subject concerning which the truth of history should be stated.

It is not true that as long as the Filipinos were in the field as an organized force they were guilty of brutality to their prisoners. All the evidence is to the contrary, both in their war with Spain, and in the earlier stages of their war with us. And it is not true that that single chapter of the history of this war has been creditable to the forces of the United States. The censorship imposed by the commanding general was for the purpose of excluding from the American public the knowledge of what we have been doing over there. From the beginning cities were burned, towns were burned, villages were burned, and the destruction of property was the chief aim of our forces.

The Hague conference forbade the destruction of property of noncombatants. The Hague conference forbade the destruction of cities and farmhouses. The Hague conference laid down rules of war far more humane than were recognized by the great nations of the earth at the period of the civil war in America. Every line of every canon of the law laid down by The Hague conference has been violated by our Army in the Philippine Islands. Every law and every canon of the laws of war laid down by The Hague conference is being violated by the British army in South Africa. It is the old, old story of conquest—the old story of murder and not of war. And yet gentlemen have the audacity to stand here and say, "Why do you want to say that our soldiers would do so and so?" I say that our soldiers have done these things in obedience to the orders of men who bear commissions as generals of our forces.

I hope the time will never come when an American Representative will hesitate to characterize such sheer brutality, such licensed violence, such offenses against the laws of God and man as this atrocious order, as inhuman and offensive to every enlightened conscience on earth. I call upon gentlemen who would draw a parallel between the conduct of the war in the Philippines and our great civil war to be more specific. They say that our soldiers in the Philippines are only traveling in the path marked out by the soldiers in the war of 1861–1865. I deny it. It is false. The veterans of the great war will feel complimented when they see in the papers that the course of the Federal generals is being held out as a license for what is being done in Samar. The generals who led them will feel complimented when they hear that gentlemen on this floor have characterized their campaigns as a warrant for the Smith campaign in Samar. They will feel complimented when they learn that in order to vindicate the author of the Samar butchery you seek to besmirch the reputation of the men who, on both sides of that great contest, exhibited a degree of honor and chivalry that will forever render the generals who led and the soldiers who fought in that great struggle illustrious. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the soldiers for the Union in the war of 1861–1865 ought to be given an opportunity to speak for themselves. In the State of Indiana there was dedicated yesterday a monument in memory of the soldiers and sailors who lost their lives in that war—the most magnificent monument ever erected to private soldiers in all Christendom. The night before the formal dedication took place the soldiers of Indiana met and passed the following resolutions——

Mr. COCHRAN. Before the gentleman reads those resolutions, will he allow me to ask whether it is not stated in the dispatch which he is about to read that those resolutions were railroaded through over the opposition of a large number of those present?

Mr. LANDIS. No, sir. Not only is it not a fact that they were railroaded through over the heads of a majority of those who attended the convention——

Mr. COCHRAN. I did not say "a majority." I said a "large number."

Mr. LANDIS. Not only were they not railroaded through over the heads of a large number of those who were there, but they went through championed by one of the most distinguished Democrats of the State of Indiana. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And they were denounced by some of the best Republicans in that organization. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANDIS. That is all right, but the resolutions went through all the same, championed by a Democrat who was nominated two years ago by the Democratic party for Congress in the district which I have the honor to represent—nominated on a platform denouncing the war in the Philippines, when their candidate was leading a company in the Philippine Islands. Obedient to the same consistency, I would not be surprised to see the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] two years hence upon a platform made up of the order alleged to have been issued by General Smith in Samar, supporting Gen. Jacob Smith for President of the United States. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANDIS. I say that would be entirely consistent——

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANDIS. I will read these resolutions. Let the soldiers of Indiana speak for themselves:

Whereas certain citizens of the United States are now criticising the conduct of our comrades in arms who are defending the American flag and American institutions in the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas such conduct brings fresh to our memory like criticisms made by the copperheads of 1860 to 1865; and

Whereas the veterans of the war for the Union abhor and despise all citizens of the United States who refuse to support our Government during war and can not see wherein the copperheads of 1898 to 1902 are less venomous than their ancestors: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the survivors of the war for the Union heartily approve the conduct of the United States in the war with Spain and the insurrection in the Philippine Islands, and that we hold in scorn and contempt all citizens of the United States who see fit to brand our soldiers and their conduct as cruel and inhuman.

Mr. Chairman, those are the words and those are the sentiments of the soldiers of Indiana who followed the flag and fought for the Union from 1861 to 1865. They speak for themselves. They ask no Democrat who comes from Missouri to speak for them. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several members called for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the informal amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I was glad to see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] rise in his place and with dramatic force reiterate what the soldiers of the Union did from 1861 to 1865. That has been a popular diversion on that side of the Chamber for a good many years.

Mr. FOSS. I shall have to call the gentleman from Missouri to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] raises the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri is not discussing the paragraph of the bill under consideration. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN. I should like to discuss the resolution presented by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the paragraph of the bill under consideration. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to present an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the informal amendment of the gentleman from Missouri will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] rises to present an amendment, which he will state.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My motion is to strike out the last line read by the Clerk. I ask unanimous consent to occupy three minutes in order to read the proceedings of the encampment referred to by my colleague [Mr. LANDIS] in his speech just made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to read a certain article which he describes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSS. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not rise to make a speech, but to read the proceedings of the encampment referred to by my colleague, covering about a dozen lines. I think if I am allowed to do this it will facilitate the passage of the bill and will save time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has already been indulgent, but I ask this, as it is directly in response to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. FOSS. I will for three minutes, but I want to give notice from now on that I shall insist upon gentlemen speaking here in the committee to matters germane to the bill.

Mr. KEHOE. Does that apply to the gentleman's side of the Chamber as well?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized for three minutes from this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, as bearing upon the questions presented and the resolution read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], and as to whether it is the sentiment of the body that acted upon it, I desire to read about twelve lines of the proceedings in the convention and bearing on its action. It may be, as the gentleman says, that Capt. D. F. Allen, of Frankfort, Ind., was an expansionist nominated on a nonexpansion platform in his district, but the result of the election showed the return of the present Representative to represent his party by a good and safe majority.

Mr. LANDIS. Does the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not until I get through with a very brief extract from a correct statement of the proceedings of the G. A. R. convention in Indianapolis.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LANDIS. I wish to ask the gentleman if he denies that those resolutions were passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just listen until I get through with my three-minute proceeding and the gentleman will be satisfied without asking any questions. It reads as follows:

Delegates took sides on the question vigorously. The division was not on party lines, as some of the best-known Republican veterans in the State like Smiley N. Chambers, of this city, and ex-Congressman Johnson, of Rockville, led the fight against the resolution.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Chambers again took the floor and bitterly denounced the resolution as a suicidal measure——

Mr. HEMENWAY (interrupting). Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do for the present.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman heard the Chairman state that. I am speaking through the Chair.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why does not the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this time taken up in interruption will not be taken from my three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly will.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Resuming the reading of this resolution——

Mr. LANDIS. Well, read it consecutively.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should be called to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] is not in order. His colleague is entitled to the floor. [Loud laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend, and it will not be taken from his time, until the committee is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, I will get through all right.

Mr. LANDIS. But you will not read it all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] usually observes the rulings of the Chair. We are all from Indiana, and Indianians are courteous. I will continue the reading, and not trespass on the time and courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

destined, if not designed, to aim a serious blow at the organization. He begged that such a resolution not be passed. He said in compliance with the instructions of the encampment he had framed a resolution along the lines suggested, which he desired to read.

STOP PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE.

Commander Garrigus and James F. Dodge, chairman of the resolutions committee, stoutly refused to allow Mr. Chambers to read this resolution, however, and the department commander ordered a vote taken on the committee resolution. Mr. Chambers resorted to a parliamentary subterfuge in the hope of saving the encampment from what he regarded as an impending peril. He offered his resolution as an amendment, and so by outwitting the department commander got to read it.

A motion was then made to table the amendment, which, in the heat of the moment, was carried. Gen. Irvin Robbins then made the point that the tabling of the amendment tabled the resolution, but although this is a recognized rule of parliamentary procedure, the department commander held otherwise and declared the original resolution carried.

Another reliable account says:

The trouble started after the resolutions committee had read the resolution which it had indorsed. The resolutions were being considered one at a time. Capt. C. J. Murphy, formerly of Evansville, but now of this city, at once took the floor to denounce the resolution, which he did in the most vigorous manner as a measure wholly unwise and wholly out of place in a Grand Army of the Republic State encampment. He said he would have no trouble in convincing those who believe that the "water cure" and other unheard of cruelties that are reported as being practiced upon the natives of the Philippines were matters beyond the criticism of the American people, are beyond condemnation of the civilized world. Mr. Chambers followed Mr. Murphy. He protested most vigorously against the resolution and urged that it be withdrawn. He said such a measure introduced under the circumstances was an outrage upon the organization and would endanger the Grand Army. He said he would favor a resolution sustaining the Government in the prosecution of the war, if one were offered, but he would never support the measure before the house.

So this is the resolution and the record of proceedings out of which the gentleman would mold a controversy. He is entitled to all the satisfaction he can draw from it. It pictures a resolution that was deprecated and opposed, spoken against and denounced by members representing the best eloquence and the best soldier blood of the Grand Army of the Republic and of the Republican party. And I do not hesitate to say that the feelings and judgment expressed by Smiley N. Chambers and ex-Congressman Johnson, both high in the counsels and wisdom of the Republican party, are shared by the rank and file of the Grand Army of the Republic. [Applause].

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman——

Several members on the Democratic side called for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The committee will be in order.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COCHRAN. I object. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for what?

Mr. LANDIS. I ask unanimous consent for one minute to read from——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. I made the objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not make it unless he rises in his seat.

Mr. COCHRAN (rising). I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri objects. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move that both sides be allowed to submit affidavits. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read from the Indianapolis Sentinel that the Grand Army of the Republic adopted a bitter resolution against critics of the war——

Mr. COCHRAN. I object. I object.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. COCHRAN. I object. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Coal and transportation: For the purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, and other equipment purposes, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same, $2,500,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word in line 5, for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman who is in charge of the bill. This item is for coal and transportation. The following words seem to be new: In line 3, after the words "for purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use," come the new words "and other equipment purposes, including," etc.

I want to ask the gentleman if that item is for the purchase of fuel, or is it the intention of the committee, by reporting the new words, to authorize this appropriation for use in the construction of buildings or other matters than the purchase of fuel? What is the necessity for the other words "and other equipment purposes?"

Mr. FOSS. I will say to my colleague that this language was sent up by the Department, and we have really no explanation upon those words; but I take it that the words "for purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, and for other equipment purposes," would apply probably to the coal for the Bureau.

Mr. CANNON. If that be so, it ought not to be in; but if it is for fuel for the general purposes of the Navy and not for the construction of buildings, why, I have no objection to it. I do not know what the necessity is for it, and if the gentleman is not informed and is satisfied that it is not for the purpose that I have indicated, I have nothing further to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the informal amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Depots for coal: To enable the Secretary of the Navy to execute the provisions of section 1552 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to establish, at such places as he may deem necessary, suitable depots for coal and other fuel, for the supply of steamships of war, $640,000; in all $640,000.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to strike out the words "in all, $640,000." They are simply surplusage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Equipment: For freight and transportation of equipment stores, packing boxes and materials, printing, advertising, telegraphing, books, and models; stationery for the Bureau; furniture for equipment offices in navy-yards; postage on letters sent abroad; ferriage, ice, and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Equipment unforeseen and impossible to classify, $35,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest a point of order in line 8, page 17, the words "for the Bureau."

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is content that the words shall go out. I do not care about making the point of order, but I would if it was necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois move an amendment?

Mr. CANNON. No; I make the point of order, and the gentleman confesses it. I think that is the best way to put it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the words "for the Bureau," in line 8, page 17.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: For one superintendent of ropewalk, at $1,875; one clerk, at $1,400; on clerk, at $1,200; one writer, at $960; one writer, at $960; in all, $6,475.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, while this bill was under discussion yesterday——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TONGUE. To ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. TONGUE. While this bill was under discussion yesterday, I submitted some remarks, and at the close requested unanimous consent that they be extended in the RECORD. I was somewhat surprised at an objection coming from a gentleman who is usually the soul of courtesy. Subsequently I learned that it was owing to a transaction that took place previously, to which I was not a party. I think now the gentleman who made the objection considers it hardly fair to punish me for conduct for which I am in no wise responsible, and I therefore now renew the request that I be permitted to extend in the RECORD the remarks which I made yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK. I couple with that a request that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is modified by the gentleman from Missouri requesting that his colleague [Mr. VANDIVER] be also allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Maintenance of yards and docks: For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely: For freight, transportation of materials and stores; books, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants; machinery; purchase and maintenance of oxen, horses, and driving teams; carts, timber wheels, and all vehicles for use in the navy-yards; tools and repairs of the same; postage on letters and other mailable matter on public service sent to foreign countries, and telegrams; stationery; furniture for Government houses and offices in navy-yards and for the Bureau of Yards and Docks; coal and other fuel, candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, and fire apparatus and plants; incidental labor at navy-yards; water tax, tolls, and ferriage; pay of watchmen in navy-yards; awnings and packing boxes, and advertising for yards and docks and other purposes; and for rent of wharf and storehouse at Erie, Pa., for use and accommodation of U. S. S. Michigan, $600,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill to the following words in lines 21 and 22—

And for the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

The same point of order would lie there as to the words a few moments ago.

Mr. FOSS. No; that applies to furniture. It is not stationery.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am making the point of order against these words. This item is for the maintenance of yards and docks. Now, I do not want to interfere with that in the slightest. For freight and so on, and for all these matters—for furniture for Government houses, offices, and navy-yards—I do not want to interfere. The words that I do want to interfere with are "and for the Bureau of Yards and Docks." Now, this Bureau of Yards and Docks makes a contingent fund in the Bureau of the Department. And it is like unto the other; and my objection to it is that the legislative bill carries it in the contingent fund for the Navy Department which is available, and this duplicates that.

Mr. FOSS. It is in our last year's bill.

Mr. CANNON. I know it was. But my friend will see at once that even if it was in the former bill it is vicious legislation that is apt to crawl in, but I apprehend that it escaped his eye.

Mr. FOSS. I will let it go out.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman confesses the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand what the point of order was, but on the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, that he confesses the point of order, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. I do not wish to confess the point of order, but if the gentleman desires to strike out those words, why, upon his statement and explanation of it, I will agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois confesses the point of order the Chair will sustain the point of order, but the Chair was not able to catch enough of the discussion to know what the point is.

Mr. CANNON. "And for the Bureau of Yards and Docks," in lines 21 and 22. My point is that that provides a contingent fund in the Navy Department for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, whereas always heretofore, before the bills were divided, and since, where it has been challenged, the legislative bill provides a contingent fund for the Navy Department proper.

Mr. GROW. Move to strike it out. That is the quickest way.

Mr. CANNON. I will let it go out by unanimous consent if that is the easiest way, but I do not want to waive my rights on the point of order. I will let it go out by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the words "and for the Bureau of Yards and Docks," in lines 21 and 22, be stricken from the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14046), and had reached no resolution thereon.

LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask that the document which I send to the desk be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the document which the Clerk will read by its title may be printed as a House document.

The Clerk read as follows:

Swamp lands in Alaska—hearings before the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, Wednesday, February 19, 1902.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether there is a statement accompanying the report of the committee showing how much this will cost.

Mr. LACEY. I will say to the gentleman the committee has authority to publish this without leave of the House, but by publishing it as a House document instead of a committee document it goes to the document room, where it will be for the general benefit of members and be more convenient for access than if it were published by the committee. The committee has authority to publish it, but then it will be a committee document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for fortifications and the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, from the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the fortifications appropriation bill, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Mr. HEMENWAY, Mr. LITTAUER, and Mr. MCRAE.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting certain correspondence and a copy of the convention which the Government of Colombia is ready to sign with the United States respecting an isthmian canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to publish as a House document certain papers from the State Department affecting an isthmian canal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 17, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by W. J. BROWNING, Chief Clerk, who read the following communication:

MAY 17, 1902.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore during this day.

D. B. HENDERSON, Speaker.

Thereupon Mr. DALZELL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered prayer.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair, for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Navy-yard, New York, N. Y.: For 1 clerk, at $1,400; 1 writer, at $1,017.25; 1 yard pilot, $2,000; 2 masters of tugs, at $1,500 each; 2 writers, at $800 each; 1 foreman laborer, at $4.50 per diem; 1 mail messenger, at $2 per diem, including Sundays; 2 messengers, at $2.25 per diem each; 1 draftsman, at $5 per diem; 1 quarterman, at $3 per diem; 1 superintendent of teams, or quarterman, at $4 per diem; 1 messenger to commandant, at $2.25 per diem, including Sundays; 1 messenger, yards and docks, at $2.25 per diem; 1 stenographer and typewriter, at $3.25 per diem; 1 electrician, at $1,400; 1 bookkeeper, or accountant, at $1,200; in all, $21,666.13.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 17, after the word "diem," insert "including Sundays when employed."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. I will say to the gentleman that I would like to have this matter passed over in order to give me time to investigate it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this paragraph will be passed over temporarily.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, San Juan, Porto Rico: One clerk, $1,200; one writer, commandant's office, $960; one mail messenger, $420; in all, $2,580.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The day that the committee took up the bill I inquired of the chairman of the committee if he could give us the amount appropriated in this bill for improvements in our insular possessions. The chairman said that later on he would do so. We have passed one item relating to Cavite, in the Philippine Islands, and we are now on one for Porto Rico, and still right ahead is another for Hawaii, and still another for Cavite. I would be glad if the chairman would state how much this bill carries for our new possessions, and where the improvements are to be made.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that these are the only two items which we have reached—San Juan and Porto Rico, $2,580, and also one in Cavite, a small item for $2,460.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was looking the bill through yesterday, and I found ten or twelve items, but I did not aggregate them myself, and I thought the gentleman had the amount.

Mr. FOSS. I have not added up the amounts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are the amounts the same that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no. We have not made any large appropriations for the Philippine Islands or Porto Rico. There was an estimate that came in for the establishment of a naval station at San Juan, Porto Rico, but we cut them out. There were estimates for a naval station in the Philippine Islands, but that we cut out. The only provisions we made for foreign stations is some small appropriations for the old Spanish station at Cavite, near Manila, which we have been using, and to it have added temporary buildings, tools, machinery, and one thing and another, in order that we might be able to make repairs on our ships.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any provision in the bill for enlarging the residence for the Navy officers at Manila?

Mr. FOSS. Not at all; the only provision of any importance that we make is to provide for a floating dock which can be used there or at any other naval station. That is the only item of any importance whatever.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The naval officers there stated to me that they were anxious to have their headquarters enlarged. I did not know but that this bill provided for it.

Mr. FOSS. I know they are very anxious about it, but the policy of the committee has been to go slow in the establishment of naval stations abroad.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the chairman aggregates the amounts that under this bill go to our colonies, I would be glad to know the sum.

Mr. FOSS. I will have the clerk figure them up.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask not only for my own information, but for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Navy-yard, New York, N. Y.: Paving and grading, to continue, $20,000; dredging, to continue, $25,000; coal-storage and coal-handling plant, extensions, $100,000; railroad system, extensions, $15,000; extending building numbered 41, $60,000; locomotive and car shed, $25,000; improvements to building numbered 120, $22,000; fittings for building numbered 33, $6,000; fittings and electric tower, building numbered 22, $27,000; extending locomotive-crane track, $20,000; electric plant, extensions, $40,000; electric-light system, extensions on cob dock, $28,000; rebuilding crane track, dry dock numbered 3, $17,000; extending building numbered 116, $10,000; coal pocket and machinery for construction and repair, $6,000; electric wiring, building numbered 28, $6,000; storehouse for naval supply fund stores, to complete, $50,000; new roof for steam-engineering foundry, $22,000; in all, navy-yard, New York, N. Y., $499,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28, line 15, after the word "dollars," insert "barracks for enlisted men to cost $500,000, $200,000."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we had better dispose of the point of order now. This is simply the continuance of a public work. If a provision like this is subject to a point of order, then every similar provision in the bill will go out on a point of order. This is for the continuance of a public work of improvement at one of these navy-yards, and every improvement of any kind must be authorized in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. FOSS. I simply reserve the point of order to hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. For a great number of years the enlisted men at the navy-yard at Brooklyn were housed in a receiving ship called the Vermont. Last summer this vessel was discontinued as a receiving ship, and in place of it the Columbia, which was built as a commerce destroyer, was substituted. The Columbia is entirely unfit for this purpose. It was built for the purpose of being used in time of war to destroy the commerce of any enemy on the high seas. It is constructed so that it may develop the highest possible speed and it has sufficient armament to overcome the trading vessel. It is so cut up with compartments and filled with machinery that it is not at all suited for the purposes of a receiving ship.

Some time in January of the present year I introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for information regarding the discontinuance of the Vermont as a receiving ship at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard. That resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public service, copies of all reports, papers, and documents relative to the discontinuance of the Vermont as a receiving ship at the New York Navy-Yard, and the present disposition of the said Vermont, together with a statement of the number of men received on the said Vermont for a period of five years previous to its discontinuance as a receiving ship, the average number of men housed thereon during the said period, the number of men who reported sick on said vessel during said period, with the nature of their ailments, and the number of men who died thereon during said period, with the causes of their death.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public service, what, if any, practices and regulations are now, or heretofore have been, in force to prevent the occurrence, communication, or spread of disease on the receiving ships of the United States Navy now in commission.

The information furnished in reply to that resolution is contained in House Document No. 385. It shows that in the year prior to its discontinuance the Vermont housed some 8,000 or 10,000 men, the men coming there at different periods. The Vermont had a capacity of some 700 or 800 men. The sea-going complement of the Columbia is 447 men, including, I think, the officers. This vessel is in no way suited for the purposes for which it is now used.

The Vermont was discontinued as a receiving ship upon the report of several officers that it had become so infected with disease germs as to be unsuited for such a purpose. It was further stated that it was impossible to place the vessel in a proper sanitary condition. The resolution which I have already read asked the Secretary of the Navy to inform the House what precautions of a sanitary nature had been taken to prevent disease on board of this and similar ships. The reply of the Secretary states that "on all receiving ships special care is taken to prevent the spread of epidemic disease. Every effort is made to keep the ships clean and in good sanitary condition. * * * The medical officers of all these ships are active in taking every precaution against the introduction and spread of such diseases, in which work they have the hearty cooperation of the commanding officers."

After such a statement it would be natural to find some report upon which it is based. I will quote from the board of medical officers convened for the purpose of inquiring into and reporting upon the sanitary condition of the Vermont:

The locality from which all the cases occurred is at a point on the berth deck just abaft of the bag room. Bags and hammocks, the property of the enlisted force of the Navy, are received at all times and from all parts of the world and are stored in the bag room without being previously disinfected, or other means taken looking toward the freeing of the wearing apparel and bedding from contagious and infectious material. The custom is a dangerous one, introducing and spreading disease of all kind throughout the service, as is shown in two cases of cerebro-spinal meningitis sent from this vessel to the Buffalo, in a draft of men, and one case to the Dixie under similar conditions.

The space alluded to on the berth deck is used at night by a number of men who sleep there, and the apparent focus of infection in the cases of cerebro-spinal meningitis has been traced with reasonable certainty to this point. It is impossible to locate in the ship a point from which the other contagious and infectious diseases may have arisen, but their continual recurrence would indicate that the ship has become thoroughly infected, and is at the present time serving as the original focus of infection for many of the cases which have recently developed, such as measles, German measles, scarlet fever, diphtheria, and mumps.

Apparently no precautions whatever, instead of every precaution, were taken on board that vessel to prevent the occurrence and spread of disease. The statement just quoted is the only reference made in all the reports contained in House Document No. 385 upon the question of precautions, excepting the gratuitous statement of the Secretary already mentioned.

Mr. Chairman, there is a public lodging house in the city of New York where those unfortunates who are unable to secure lodgings for the night are housed free at the city's expense. One of the requirements in that lodging house is that to get lodging there one must first take a bath and hand over his clothing to be disinfected. Recruits for the Navy at every enlistment station come from every quarter of the world and from all conditions of life. Their clothing is likely to and at times does contain disease germs; yet no precaution whatever was taken; nothing was done in the way of disinfecting to prevent the occurrence or the spread of disease.

Upon the reports of different boards and officers differing and conflicting, the Navy Department ordered that the Vermont be condemned and stricken from the naval list. There was no necessity for such action. An estimate had been submitted to the Department by an efficient officer that the vessel could be thoroughly renovated and disinfected and made ready for use for the sum of $54,240. On February 28, 1902, I introduced a joint resolution to restore the Vermont to the naval list and disinfect it and renovate and repair it according to the estimate referred to, and for the purposes provided an appropriation of $54,240. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it is there to-day. My efforts to secure a report were unavailing. No action, either favorable or unfavorable, has ever been taken upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Vermont could readily have been made serviceable for many years. At the time the vessel was condemned last summer the public evinced much interest. The statement made by the board of medical officers, "that whatever measures may be adopted it would be impossible to place the Vermont in a hygienic condition," attracted considerable attention and caused much discussion. I wish to call attention to an interview with Dr. Doty, health officer of the port of New York, which appeared in the New York Tribune on August 6, 1902. Dr. Doty has made an exhaustive study of disinfection. Time and again vessels arriving at New York with persons afflicted with contagious diseases have been thoroughly disinfected. Dr. Doty's interview is as follows:

There is no ship in our Navy that need be destroyed because of danger of infection. The Vermont could easily be cleared of any germs that might be in her by a thorough fumigation with sulphur dioxide. It is absurd to say that the wood is so impregnated with the germs of disease that nothing can be done with it. The ship has never, as I understand, been used as a hospital, and she certainly has not lain in water that would soak her with disease.

If the Vermont had lain outside of one of the rivers of Cuba or at a place in the harbor of Habana where she would have been in the way of sewage that contained the germs of yellow fever, her hull might have become so saturated with disease germs that it would be necessary to build that part anew. There is no assertion made that the hull is impregnated, but rather that the interior woodwork of the vessel is full of germs.

Even if the old vessel had been used as a hospital ship or had at some time been filled with persons suffering from infectious disease, there would be no danger. Germs are not only easy to kill, but it is difficult to keep them alive. After a reasonable time has elapsed succeeding the disease the germs die from contact with the air, and there is actually no need for even fumigation. So even if the vessel had some time ago been filled with the organisms which convey disease, there would now be no danger.

For many years now the vessel has lain in clean waters, and could not possibly have gathered disease germs, so I can see no earthly reason for destroying her. It is possible that we may need a better vessel for a receiving ship, but if so, we can have it without destroying this relic of our early naval history.

Of course, I do not wish to appear as opposed to any move that the authorities may see fit to make, and there may be reasons for the destruction of the Vermont with which I am not familiar.

If it could be true that the wood in the vessel were impregnated with germs, there is no possible way in which they could be exterminated, because the steam, which would be the only method of fumigation, would not penetrate far enough into the wood to be effective. But germs do not, where the material is dry wood, penetrate to the interior. They lie on the surface. By this you can see that it is impossible for the alleged hypothesis of absolute impregnation to exist.

There were officials in the Navy Department who held the same views. On August 7, 1901, the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair said in an indorsement on some papers in this matter:

2. The Bureau is of the opinion that the Vermont can be satisfactorily fumigated and provided with a sterilizing apparatus that would justify her maintenance in service as a receiving ship.

The Vermont, however, was evidently doomed. So fearful were some officials that the vessel would remain in the service that the most sweeping statements were made regarding its condition. Thus, when the Naval Reserves of the State of Maine made an effort to secure the vessel for their use the application was denied. The refusal was based upon this indorsement of the Bureau of Navigation on August 10, 1901, upon the application:

The Bureau recommends that the Vermont be not considered available for use of the Naval Reserves of the State of Maine. The fact that this ship is infected with contagious disease germs precludes it from being used as a habitation of any kind for any person.

After the Vermont was supplanted by the Columbia little was done by the Department to dispose of it until the resolution of inquiry was introduced by me. Prior to that time, however, the vessel was appraised at $18,000. Then the Department became anxious to dispose of the Vermont at the appraised value, and to do so took the most astounding action conceivable. The Navy Department offered to sell the Vermont to the Treasury Department for use in the Marine-Hospital Service. The offer suggested that the Vermont might be used in the same manner that the Jamestown and Omaha were used. To ascertain just what use was made of such vessels, I communicated with the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service. He advised me that those vessels are floating disinfecting plants and essential parts of the quarantine stations at Cape Charles and San Francisco. Each vessel is provided with a complete outfit of disinfecting apparatus for the sterilization of effects belonging to ships and persons which may arrive at the stations mentioned.

That is not the only use to which the Jamestown is put. The Treasury Department issues a list of all kinds and classes of vessels under the American flag, both Government and those controlled by private concerns and individuals. According to that document the Jamestown is also used as a place of detention of persons who arrive at the station in infected vessels. And the Navy Department, after determining that the Vermont was unfit as a habitation of any kind by reason of its infection with disease germs, offered it to the Treasury Department for use in the Marine-Hospital Service, with no warning or explanation of the reason why it was discarded by the Navy. Truly an astonishing situation.

After I had introduced the resolution of inquiry, which I believe was introduced on the 20th of January last, the Navy Department displayed great activity. Nothing had been done about the vessel since December. On January 24, however, the Secretary of the Navy appealed to the President to advertise the vessel for sale for four weeks instead of ninety days, as provided by law. No bid was received which equaled the appraised value, and after a reappraisement the vessel was eventually sold for $15,000. Mr. Chairman, I believe that these facts should be placed before the country. No good reason existed for the abandonment of the Vermont. One of the officers to whom this matter was referred stated that this vessel was in very good condition and could be put in suitable condition at an expenditure of $54,240. He said:

The borings demonstrated a conspicuous absence of dry rot and softness frequently found in wooden vessels of her age. The hold is sweet and quite free from unpleasant odors of any description. The Vermont compares most favorably with all the other wooden vessels which have recently come under my personal notice while serving as a member of the board of inspection and survey, and I have the honor to submit herewith plans and estimates for placing the Vermont in efficient condition as a receiving ship, with accommodations for comfortably berthing 300 more men than is at present possible.

The Columbia, which is in use at present, is totally unfit for use as a receiving ship. The Bureau of Construction and Repair stated, under date of August 16, 1901, as follows:

The Bureau considers the Columbia unsuitable for use as a receiving ship. The number of men who can be lodged and fed, over and above the regular crew, will be about one-fourth of the capacity of the Vermont, while the expense of maintenance will be greater and the sanitary conditions not appreciably better.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for about three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to be permitted to talk for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This report states that the Columbia from a sanitary standpoint is not appreciably better than was the Vermont. The statement had substantial foundation. A board appointed to consider and report upon such work as was absolutely necessary to fit the Columbia for temporary duty as a receiving ship reported on August 9, 1901, among other things that—

The Columbia, having been in ordinary for many months, with no crew on board and with only such care and attention as was necessary to preserve the ship from deterioration, is dirty and in no condition to receive men until thoroughly cleaned out. * * *

The seagoing complement of the Columbia is 447 men, and, judging by the small available crew space and limited character of direct ventilation therein, so large a number of men recently recruited and unaccustomed to life on board ship could not be accommodated without incurring risk of unsatisfactory conditions similar to those recently found on the U. S. receiving ship Vermont, which were directly attributed to overcrowding. In fact, 400 men on the Columbia would involve greater crowding, with less ventilation, than would be the case with 1,000 men on the Vermont.

While the provision of living space for wardroom and warrant officers is ample, there is great scarcity of proper office accommodation for the pay, medical, and recruiting officers of a receiving ship, and, in addition to the present officers on board the Columbia, would involve the reduction of crew space and is therefore not recommended.

It must be remembered that the Vermont was condemned as unfit for habitation. The Columbia evidently is no better fitted, if as well, as the Vermont. Unless these barracks be authorized at this time nothing can be done for more than a year toward erecting them. Give the enlisted men decent quarters.

This vessel, which was built for the purpose of destroying the commerce of the enemies of the country, costing over $3,000,000, or, to be exact, for I have figured it up, $3,089,701, is practically used as a dormitory. It is not suitable for the purpose. It was intended to be temporary. Do not make it permanent. Adopt this amendment. It should be adopted. The enlisted men of the Navy should be given decent accommodations at the navy-yard at Brooklyn. Men will not remain in the service and be housed under such conditions. A premium is put on desertions. Good, desirable recruits will not be obtained if they learn that periods of some length must be spent living under conditions most undesirable.

This work should be authorized now and work commenced as quickly as possible. It is pointed out in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks that while additional land is needed at New York for some purposes, there is ample room for the barracks needed. I understand that the Naval Committee considered this question, but believed that at this time it would be inadvisable to do anything. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee again to the fact that unless some appropriation is made this year nothing can be done for another year. For that reason I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in reference to this question that has come up, that the Department sent estimates up to the Congress at the beginning of the session asking for barracks at New York, League Island, and Mare Island—$500,000 at New York, $350,000 at League Island, and $350,000 at Mare Island, making a total amount in estimate of $1,210,000. Now, this subject of barracks for men at the naval stations is practically a new proposition. At the present time we are using ships, as, for instance, at New York Navy-Yard the Columbia, and we are getting along very well with the use of ships. Of course I know, as the gentleman has stated, that the Vermont was in very bad condition, but the Vermont has been condemned, and we have the Columbia there, which answers every purpose at the present time. Now, the question is, is it advisable for us to go into this new proposition of building barracks at the navy-yards throughout the country? If you build barracks at one navy-yard you must at another; and for my part I see no necessity at the present time for going into the large expenditure of money.

So far as the New York Navy-Yard is concerned, there is no available site for such barracks. Why, everything is crowded over there at the present time, and in the estimates sent to us by the Department this year they ask for $2,000,000 for more land at the New York Navy-Yard. Now, in view of the fact that there seems to be no special necessity at this time for these barracks, and at the same time believing that this matter is subject to a point of order, while at first I did not feel inclined to insist upon it, yet I do now insist upon my point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman says that this proposition to erect barracks at the different navy-yards is a new question.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; practically a new proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the report the gentleman submitted at the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress contained this statement:

Our Government is the last of the maritime nations to adopt the barracks system for receiving.

And in that bill, if I recollect correctly, the gentleman had an item for several hundred thousand dollars for barracks for the different navy-yards of the country. The gentleman's committee must have been considering this proposition for at least two years, and I respectfully submit to the gentleman that it is not a new proposition.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; it is not a new proposition, so far as consideration by the committee is concerned. Two years ago I thought we should have to construct barracks. I was in favor of the proposition then, because I did not see any way out of it. I thought it would be necessary then; but we have tided over that emergency, which arose somewhat from the Spanish-American war, and I believe by the use of ships, as we are doing now, we can do away with this expenditure of money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do you believe——

Mr. FOSS. I do not say but that I may be in favor of the proposition a year or two years or three years from now. Emergencies may arise which may necessitate the construction of barracks, but for the present I do not see any necessity for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe that a vessel costing over $3,000,000 should be used as a barracks for about 400 men? That is the condition at the New York Navy-Yard.

Mr. FOSS. What would you use that vessel for if not for barracks at the present time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the use of building a vessel if you are just going to tie it to a dock and use it for a house? Why not spend a couple of hundred thousand dollars and have your house, which will be better for the purposes for which it is intended than the vessel which is being used for a purpose for which it was not intended.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman must understand that we can not keep all our ships out at sea all the time. There must always be some in port and some going out. You can not keep all the vessels of your Navy always on blue water, and when these ships are in port they can be used for some useful purpose just as well as to be laid up doing nothing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman again to this statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, in which he states that that vessel, the Columbia, is wholly unsuited for use as a receiving ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule invoked in this instance by the chairman of the committee is one which has not at all times and by all chairmen been similarly interpreted. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair a rather large hole was driven through the rule in order to permit the construction of battle ships without special authorization; but it seems to the Chair that the entering upon the construction of barracks in the way suggested by this amendment is the entering upon a new line of work. It is not a necessary adjunct to the New York Navy-Yard. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair, under a strict interpretation of the rule, a proper amendment. It is, in the opinion of the Chair, under a fair construction of the rule, obnoxious to it. The statute expressly provides, in reference to barracks for the Army, that they can not be constructed except after specific estimates therefor shall come to the House, and then only by a special act providing for them. Now, while that does not apply to the Navy, it seems to the Chair that in interpreting the rule it is fair to consider that provision. As the Chair intimated, the decisions have not been identical; but the notion of the Chair is borne out by ample precedents that this amendment is not in order, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, League Island, Pa.: To continue retaining wall about reserve basin, $50,000; grading and paving, to continue, $25,000; sewer system, extensions, $5,000; electric plant, extensions, $40,000; railroad system, extensions, $15,000; officers' quarters, additional, $8,000; power house for construction and repair, $50,000; angle smithery for construction and repair, to complete, $15,000; plate-bending shop for construction and repair, to complete, $25,000; piers, extensions, $60,000; locomotive-crane track, extensions, $30,000; machinery foundations, steam engineering buildings, $38,800; power house for steam engineering, $46,000; dredging, to continue, $25,000; water closets, additional, $2,500; water system, extension, $12,000; in all, navy-yard, League Island, $447,300.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer at the end of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 29, in line 10, after the word "dollars," insert "toward storehouse for naval supplies, $75,000."

And in line 11, after the word "Island," strike out "four hundred and forty-seven" and insert "five hundred and twenty-two."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to continue the construction at League Island of what is known as "storehouse for naval supplies." I do not think that I am in any way infracting the rules that surround the performance of the committee when I state that it has been the policy of the Naval Affairs Committee to reduce as much as possible the appropriations of this year made for new constructions in the navy-yards. We had no trouble in the committee in concluding upon such a policy, and to that end I believe every member of the committee used his best efforts. When the estimates came from the Department of Yards and Docks, they were found to be very largely in excess of what the committee thought it could recommend to the House for adoption.

Therefore Admiral Endicott, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, was asked to appear before the committee and cut (as much as possible) his estimates. He was further requested to make known to the committee what was absolutely necessary in his judgment to be done at the different navy-yards, so that the work already begun might be continued and not interfered with. In giving to the committee the different items he says that he inadvertently omitted to recommend an appropriation of $75,000 for continuing the work upon the "storehouse for naval supplies" at League Island, and it is for the purpose and upon the suggestion—I should say upon the request—of Admiral Endicott that I offer this amendment, so that the appropriation may be made and the work on this building be continued. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs will permit the amendment to be offered as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOSS. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I want to ask my colleague upon the committee if this appropriation is for the continuance of the construction of a building already authorized.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I shall be very glad to answer my colleague. I quote the following from a letter from Admiral Endicott:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: The Army and Navy Register gives the naval bill as agreed upon in subcommittee. I do not find there, under the head of League Island, an item for continuing work upon the "Storehouse for naval supplies, $75,000." This item was inadvertently omitted from the original estimates submitted by the Department, and when I was before your subcommittee I called attention to this and requested that there be inserted the sum of $75,000 for continuing this work. This building was authorized by the act of March 3, 1901, at an ultimate cost of $224,640, and $75,000 was appropriated for work during the present fiscal year. As the appropriation already made will be exhausted before the expiration of the next fiscal year, it is very important that the funds be appropriated for continuing the work.

Mr. Chairman, I will say further to my colleague that I would be the last person to ask for an appropriation in this bill to begin any new work at League Island. This is only continuing a work already begun.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.: Gunners' storehouse, $88,000; coppersmith shop, $32,000; bronzing and plating house, $20,000; purchase of land, $100,000; in all, navy-yard, Washington, $240,000.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order upon the words "purchase of land, $100,000," in lines 16 and 17. The report is silent upon this item. It seems to me it is subject to the point of order. It may be necessary for the public service. That is one thing. I reserve the point of order, and I would like to inquire a little bit what it is about anyway.

Mr. FOSS. Well, I will say to my friend it is for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard here in Washington; and the Department feels the necessity for having more land down there. Last year, I think, they came before the committee with the recommendation for $185,000 appropriation for land there. The Attorney-General has investigated the title of some of the property and has discovered that the Government has, in his judgment, a title to a portion of this property which it is desired to buy. Last year, I think, we gave them power to condemn, and the proceedings are going on, I understand, under the direction of the Attorney-General. There is a strip of this land lying down toward the water's edge—a few blocks of it—to which the Government has no title, and for the purchase of that the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance came before the committee and earnestly and urgently asked for this appropriation of $100,000 to buy these few blocks.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, it is not the land that is authorized to be condemned. This is new land?

Mr. FOSS. It is land to which the Government has no title whatever.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. But it is not land touching the condemnation proceedings that heretofore has been authorized by Congress?

Mr. WATSON. I think I can answer that, if you will permit me to explain, that the land for which the appropriation was made, if I remember correctly the testimony, is land which lies between the land for which condemnation proceedings were authorized and the river. It is river frontage. The Government owns the land back of the river, and they want this strip on the river.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is a new item, and stands upon its own merits, not affected by legislation heretofore enacted?

Mr. WATSON. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. And it is not the land owned by the Government?

Mr. WATSON. No. It is not only next to the land now owned and occupied as the navy-yard, but between the land for which the condemnation proceedings have been authorized and taken and the river.

Mr. CANNON. How much river front is there to the Washington Navy-Yard? Well, Mr. Chairman, I can talk ordinarily loud enough to hear myself, but not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. I was under the impression that there was over a mile of river frontage to the Washington Navy-Yard. Does anybody know?

Mr. FOSS. I should say not over half, perhaps not a third of a mile.

Mr. CANNON. Indefinite. My impression a mile and my friend not over a half a mile, and perhaps not a third. How much land has the Government got in the Washington Navy-Yard? Does anybody know?

Mr. WHEELER. I think I can state what will be satisfactory to the gentleman. This is not really a navy-yard. It is really a gun shop, and it is the purpose of the committee, or the effort of the committee, to concentrate the gun works of the country at the Washington Navy-Yard, and in order to do that it will be necessary to have some additional buildings in addition to what the committee has heretofore authorized.

If the gentleman has ever been to the gun shop down here, he will understand that there is scarcely enough land to accommodate the buildings we now have on them. Reference to the hearings and the testimony of Admiral O'Neil will disclose the fact that if the present plan for the erection of buildings which are absolutely necessary to properly conduct the gun shop is to be carried out this land proposed to be purchased is a necessity.

A portion of the land referred to by the gentleman who attempted an explanation lies in front of the block which the Government thinks it has title to; but this particular block referred to, lying adjacent to the ground the Government has, is only a portion of the land suitable for the erection of the proposed new building. Unless this land is acquired, the appropriation for the building that we are informed is necessary need not be made, for there is no land now upon which we can build it. The Government must have the land or we should strike out the appropriation for the new buildings.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask how much land is comprised in the Washington Navy-Yard?

Mr. WHEELER. I am unable to answer that question, but I should suppose four or five blocks all told.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend have any information about it, or is it merely an estimate?

Mr. WHEELER. I have been over the ground repeatedly. With the exception of the river front, nearly all the land is occupied by shops and officers' quarters, with the possible exception of a small esplanade in front of the building.

Mr. CANNON. The gun shop is a mere place of assembling the forgings——

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, the gentleman is in error about that. We make all our great guns——

Mr. CANNON. The Government makes no forgings there.

Mr. WHEELER. It may not make any forgings, but we collect them and manufacture them into guns.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is a mere assembling plant.
Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand it so.
Mr. CANNON. It is like Wellfleet for the Army.
Mr. WHEELER. No; it is a gun shop; it is where we make the guns and the utensils of war. We have no steam plants by which they cast the ingots, but we take the raw material and produce the finished product.
Mr. CANNON. How many thousand feet of ground is there there?
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.
Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes longer.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. CANNON. How many acres are there of this proposed purchase?
Mr. WHEELER. I am unable to answer the question.
Mr. WATSON. I think I can inform the gentleman. I am told, and I think on reliable authority, that there are eight ordinary blocks now in the navy-yard.
Mr. WHEELER. That would be about 30 acres.
Mr. WATSON. And the proposed purchase for which the appropriation is desired amounts to two blocks.
Mr. WHEELER. No; a block and a portion of another block.
Mr. CANNON. Well, is it to cost 10 cents a foot, or 20 cents a foot, or 30 cents a foot; who knows?
Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the gentleman that the testimony before the committee disclosed the fact that negotiations have been going on for many years trying to acquire this property, and it is stated by Admiral O'Neil that an agreement had been tentatively reached by which we could acquire it for $100,000 without condemnation proceedings. The reasonableness of that price was based upon statements of people whom the Department had instructed to inquire into it and the information imparted to Admiral O'Neil.
Mr. CANNON. I recollect having a little experience in that kind of a purchase myself. For 70 acres of land over here by the insane hospital we started in, I think, at $250,000. It was investigated and legislated about and finally got down to one-half that sum and then to one-third of that, and then the House turned it down and did a very good job. In other words, I never like to see additional land bought at Washington for anything until somebody has gone to the bottom of it.
Now, I am under the impression that the river front at Washington Navy-Yard and what the Government owns there or thereabouts the Government has got all the land it needs and to spare. I should think $1.50 a foot, which would be between six and seven thousand dollars an acre, in that locality would be quite high enough price. But here is $100,000, and whether it is 1 acre or how much nobody can tell us.
Mr. WHEELER. This land is not immediately on the river front.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information, Mr. Chairman, is that the navy-yard contains 42 acres. My authority for that is this book which I have just received from the House library. It gives the amount of land purchased under various acts, and states that the site of the navy-yard was purchased for $4,000 and contains an area of 42 acres.
Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee. That is valuable information, and that is the first information we have had.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On page 59 of the last annual report of the Navy Department, at the bottom, I find this among other improvements wanted:

Additional land, improvement Washington Navy-Yard: An extension of this yard is urgently required, as the present site is practically all built over and very much crowded.

I know, Mr. Chairman, as a mattter of fact, that the navy-yard is very much crowded. It is nearly all covered with houses. We have extended our shops for a number of years, and these shops have taken up the land so that there is now hardly walking room unless you walk all the time on the pavements. I do not know whether this remark applies to all of the 40 acres, but nearly all the space down there that I have seen is covered with houses. I do not say that houses cover the 42 acres.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say, from a casual survey of the ground as my eye took it in, that there are not 20 acres covered with buildings.
Now, in all these years we have done without this land for which it is proposed to expend $100,000. We have at present, it seems, 42 acres there, and it seems to me that in the present condition of things it would be the part of wisdom to postpone this matter until next year. Therefore I insist upon my point of order.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish to state that the book from which I read this information is what is called Harper's Book of Facts, page 544.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] withdraw his point of order?
Mr. CANNON. No.
Mr. FOSS. If there is any question in the mind of the Chair——
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to be advised as to the facts. The Chair did not catch all that was said in the discussion, owing to the confusion. Is this land——
Mr. FOSS. I will say to the Chair that I think the decisions are uniform on this proposition.
The CHAIRMAN. Does this land adjoin the other land?
Mr. FOSS. Yes, sir; this is land adjoining the navy-yard.
Mr. CANNON. Is my friend from Illinois sure about that?
Mr. FOSS. Oh, yes.
The CHAIRMAN. And it can be used for the purposes of the yard?
Mr. FOSS. It can be.
Mr. CANNON. I should like to see the plat. I have no doubt my friend thinks he is correctly informed, but I am apprehensive he may be mistaken.
Mr. FOSS. Well, now, I think I can satisfy the gentleman.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that of these 42 acres some part may be land that is in litigation. There is nothing that is said in this book about that.
The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair must, of course, be based on the facts; and if the facts are in dispute, the Chair is placed in a decidedly embarrassing position.
Mr. CANNON. This bill carries already $70,000,000 for the Navy—for the building of ships, for men to man them, etc.—and I suggest to my good friend from Illinois that from the standpoint of practical wisdom it would be well that this appropriation of $100,000 go over. I appeal to him whether he does not think that this is one of the items that could wait.
Mr. FOSS. Admiral O'Neil, the head of the Bureau of Ordnance, in putting in an estimate for additional land, said:

The available building sites are now practically all taken up, and the yard is overcrowded in many respects. More buildings will be required in the near future, especially a new car house, and the present boiler plant is taxed to its utmost capacity. This is required as most urgent.

His estimate was for $185,000 for the purchase of land. We cut it down to $100,000.
Mr. CANNON. Why?
Mr. FOSS. Because we afterwards found out that there was a portion of the land to which the Government, we believed, had title, under the opinion of the Attorney-General.
Mr. CANNON. How much is there of the land to which the Government has title? Can not the Government build a dozen power houses on that much of the land?
Mr. FOSS. But that land is not adjoinining the river front, I believe.
Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Allow me to explain that the question of the Government title arises out of the fact that the land has had accretions along the river bank. The question has arisen whether the title to the land thus formed goes to the Government or to the riparian proprietors who have raised this question. It is necessary that the Government, in order to handle the navy-yard, should control the land which thus results from accretion, which would not be valuable by itself, but only in connection with the land lying back and north of it. It is for the purpose of buying the land that lies back of this accretion of land and for the residue, if it does not belong to the Government, that the appropriation is proposed.
Mr. CANNON. How much land is it proposed to buy?
Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I do not know how many acres.
Mr. DAYTON. Two bluffs.
Mr. CANNON. That is very indefinite. A "bluff" may be a quarter of an acre or 2 or 3 acres.
Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I am now ready to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois, and do so by reading from the report of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, as follows:

[Extract from annual report of department of yards and docks, navy-yard, Washington, D. C., dated August 29, 1899.]

ESTIMATE FOR WESTERN EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The increase of business and the general growth of this yard has resulted in such cramped conditions, by the extension of buildings, railroad tracks, etc., that there is at present little available room in the yard for the storage of material and other necessary purposes.
Furthermore, conditions are such that there is a present need for the extension of the yard, and this need will be accentuated, undoubtedly, in the near future.
The most available property appears to be to the westward of the yard, as shown on blue print transmitted with letter No. 213 from this office, dated August 7, 1899. It is recommended that the necessary steps be taken to so extend the yard to Fourth street east, taking in squares Nos. 826, 827, 853, and 854, and also the portions of N street south, Georgia avenue, Canal street, and Fifth street east, included in the territory bounded by the present navy-yard wall, M street south, Fourth street east, and the water front.
The only buildings upon this property at present is one on Fourth street east, near N street south, probably worth $1,000, and a small, wooden shed in N street south, probably worth $25.

The areas of the blocks named are as follows:

	Square feet.
No. 826	122,429
No. 827	75,705
No. 853	63,288
No. 854	72,828
	334,250

The title to blocks 827 and 854 may be in doubt in consequence of a late decision of the Supreme Court in re Potomac Flats.

If the title to this property does not vest in the United States, the property to be purchased would be the four above blocks enumerated.

The assessed valuation of this land is about 15 cents per square foot. In all probability a higher price, say 40 cents per square foot, would have to be paid if it were condemned, which would make the cost of the four blocks $133,700.

I recommend that the necessary steps be taken to have the land belonging to the district ceded to the navy-yard, and to have the land in the blocks referred to purchased.

Mr. DAYTON. My recollection is it is 10 acres, but I will not state that absolutely. It is from 8 to 10 acres.

Mr. CANNON. Is not this really to build quarters on?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; not at all. You have not struck it this time.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know that that is the object, but the query is whether my friend knows it is not.

Mr. FOSS. Well, I think it is safe to leave it with the Secretary of the Navy. He will pay no more for this land than is necessary.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, with the highest respect, I would not for a holy minute leave matters without Congressional supervision to the administration of any Army or Navy official. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not abusing them. I am not abusing them when I say that in the very nature of things people magnify their profession, and it is pretty difficult to tell sometimes just how valuable and how necessary amongst the great multitude of necessary things any proposed measure is, and I say again I am not abusing the Army and the Navy. You and I would do just as they are doing. You and I would be just as they are, if we were in their places. They perform their functions and we perform ours. Now, I merely claim that it seems to me we are not in a very good condition to perform ours, and therefore I am pleading for postponement.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, while I agree entirely with the gentleman so far as the question of leaving matters in the general discretion of Naval or Army officers is concerned, still here is a provision for the purchase of land which is put in in round numbers at $100,000. We can not put it in in exact dollars and cents which the Secretary of the Navy may pay for that property, but we put in a provision which we think will be sufficient to buy the property. Now, it is for him to make the purchase, and we have to leave some little discretion somewhere. This House, numbering 356 members, can not make a contract for the purchase of every bit of land we need to carry on the business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman inform the committee who owns this land?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know anything about the owner.

Mr. WHEELER. Various parties.

Mr. FOSS. The committee has not sought to buy the land. We do not know who the owners are, but it is left to the Secretary of the Navy to make the contract and to purchase it, and I think we can trust him. He is a man who has been brought up under the school of economy at which my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has long been the head, and I am sure he will drive the best bargain he can for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. I am fond of the Secretary of the Navy. I have every confidence in him, but he is at the head of a great Department where he must trust his various bureaus in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred. I can not think of any man who would be more competent than William H. Moody, and as to him on most all these questions he would be like unto a cat without claws in that place that burneth with fire and brimstone. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, upon the point of order I would like to say just a word, to call the attention of the Chair to a similar point which was decided during the last session of Congress. There was under discussion at that time a proposition to appropriate some money to buy additional land upon which to erect additional buildings for the Hospital for the Insane, the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. CANNON], having charge of it. A provision was inserted to purchase land for the specific purpose of erecting additional buildings. There was an act of Congress providing that no hospital building should be constructed except upon land already owned by the Government, and I made the point of order that that provision was in conflict with that statute, which point was sustained. Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman who is now the Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Moody), then a member of the Appropriations Committee, insisted upon a separate paragraph making an appropriation to purchase additional land without stating for what purpose it was to be used.

I made a point of order against that, but after some discussion withdrew it; thereupon it was renewed and supported by an able argument by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. We repeatedly asked the gentleman from Illinois whether it was not intended to put the additional hospital buildings on that land. He declined to answer, saying it was for the additional purposes of the hospital, and insisting that it was not subject to the point of order. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS], after an elaborate discussion, ruled as follows:

The law which the gentleman from Missouri calls to the attention of the Chair relates to the location of buildings used for hospital purposes, and declares that these buildings shall be erected upon land already owned by the Government, or that may be donated to the Government in the District of Columbia. In the opinion of the Chair, that does not militate against the power of the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate a specific sum to acquire additional territory for the asylum. Now, there is a large asylum there that is furnishing accommodations for several thousand soldiers; and it is apparent to all that the land, as well as the buildings, is necessary for this great public purpose, and the Chair thinks that the point of order is not well taken. It is for the committee to say whether the entire 145 acres shall be purchased, or, by amendment, that number of acres shall be enlarged or decreased; but that it is in continuation of this great public object the Chair has no doubt, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Now, there is no rule against the purchase of additional land any more than there is against the purchase of additional bricks or other building material, and it appearing that this is land adjacent to land already owned by the Government, that it is for the purpose of continuing the Government navy-yard, already authorized by law, it seems to me that there can be no question that the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs asserts that the land in question does adjoin the navy-yard, in addition to which the estimate submitted for this appropriation clearly states that its object is the enlargement and extension of the present yard, or, in other words, a continuance of the work in progress.

It seems to the Chair perfectly clear from that estimate, and also in line with the ruling for which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] himself contended, which ruling was made in the instance cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], that this provision is proper, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, Puget Sound, Wash.: Sewers, extensions, $5,000; to continue grading, $50,000; coal shed and appliances, including pier extensions, $150,000; fire-protection system, extensions, $3,540; electric-light plant, extensions, $20,000; telephone system, extensions, $2,000; railroad and equipment, extensions, $20,000; purchase of land, $2,000; smithery for construction and repair, extension, $40,000; plate metal shop for construction and repair, $50,000; addition to storehouse for supplies and accounts, $50,000; boat shop for construction and repair (to cost not to exceed $150,000, for which contract is hereby authorized), $50,000; water-closets, $2,500; power house for construction and repair, $70,000; storehouse for steel, $36,000; piers, $75,000; roads and walks, $15,000; water system, extensions, $5,000; locomotive crane, $8,500; foundry and coppersmith's shop (to cost not to exceed $100,000, for which contract is hereby authorized), $50,000; boiler and blacksmith shop (to cost not to exceed $100,000, for which contract is hereby authorized), $50,000; heating-system, extensions, $4,000; boiler stack and fittings for equipment shop, $10,000; in all, naval station, Puget Sound, Wash., $748,500.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 17, on page 32, insert the words "quay wall, $30,000."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this matter was recommended by the Department and considered by the committee, and were it not for the fact that additional information has reached me since the bill was reported I would not ask the committee to consider this amendment.

When Admiral Endicott was testifying before the committee he was asked by Mr. DAYTON relative to this proposition:

If you can dispense with this item, I wish you would.

To which he replied:

I can try.

Now, the conditions at the yard probably were not presented to the committee, or at least some things that have been called to my attention with relation to this yard were not presented.

On account of the appropriations made for several buildings in this bill, as well as those already provided for, there will be considerable grading required in the making of the foundations for those buildings, and the dirt taken out under present conditions will have to be hauled a considerable distance, entailing upon the Government a very great expense. The Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks kindly furnished me day before yesterday with a copy of a letter received from the commandant of the navy-yard with reference to this matter, which I desire to read. He says:

It is noted in a telegram published in the morning paper that the House subcommittee has cut out the appropriation for extension of quay wall. This wall would be doubly valuable—

(1) As giving a considerable amount of reclaimed land at the most desirable point in the yard.

I know from personal knowledge that this statement is true. It will furnish probably 3 or 4 acres of additional land right on the shore line near where the dock is located and most advantageously situated with reference to buildings already constructed.

Second, and this is the point to which I desire the special attention of the committee:

As furnishing an economical dump for earth excavated while grading for new buildings. There is now no place in the yard where earth can be dumped, except by a very long and expensive haul.

It is therefore respectfully urged that these facts may be represented, and that, if practicable, the Bureau may obtain the amount submitted by it in the estimates.

The commandant of the yard also sent to me a memorandum giving an estimate as to the difference in the cost of this grading with a quay wall constructed and the cost with it not constructed. He says:

MEMORANDUM OF QUAY WALL.

The Bureau asked for $80,000 to extend this wall.

It would be very valuable as reclaiming a considerable tract of land on the most desirable part of the water front.

It also gives a place to deposit earth excavated in the necessary grading for buildings. At present there is no place to deposit this earth, except by a long and very expensive haul. In the grading necessary for the steam engineering buildings alone, the difference in cost of grading due to the very long haul would pay for the amount of wall asked for by the Bureau. And as all the grading contemplated is in the same vicinity, the economy of building this wall is manifest, even if no valuable land were reclaimed for building purposes. The comparative expense of grading with the sea wall, and without it is roughly estimated as follows:

With sea wall and short haul	$25,000
Without sea wall and long haul	93,000

In other words, if this quay wall is provided for, the Government will more than save its cost in the grading for these different buildings. So that it is simply upon the ground of a matter of saving and economy to the Government that I offer this amendment.

The commandant of this navy-yard is Capt. W. T. Burwell, who commanded the Wheeling at Manila, and is one of the most efficient officers, I believe, that we have in the Government employ to-day. He is an officer who gives his personal attention to these matters. He is greatly interested in the building up of this yard. He is not an ornamental officer, but spends his time, day and night, in looking after and promoting the interest of the Government and in advancing the navy-yard, and in this case I have no doubt that this information he gives us here is based on his personal investigations. I know from my own knowledge that if this quay wall is constructed the haul would be very short. In other words, it furnishes a dumping place for this earth taken out almost adjacent to the buildings. As he shows here, the cost of the grading without the quay wall would be more than the cost of the wall itself, and there will be an actual saving by the building of the wall rather than an additional expenditure. Therefore I trust the chairman of the committee will be willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, this item was stricken out during the consideration of the bill when Admiral Endicott was before the committee, and it was stricken out at my instance. I want to say that if I had the information then that I now have touching this matter, corroborated as it now is by my recollection from a personal visit to the yard, I would not have objected to it.

I want to say further that I believe, from personal investigation, that for every dollar of money that has been invested in the Puget Sound Navy-Yard the Government has received full value, something that frequently is not true in the construction of public buildings. I can corroborate what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] has said in regard to the economy of construction there. At the time I made the objection I was thinking that because the water there was so superior it would not be necessary to have a quay wall, because the vessels can come in to those wooden quays that are driven out in the water; but I do believe that it would furnish a dumping ground for this material. I simply make this statement because the item was thrown out, I believe, on my motion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to ask a little bit about this naval station. I do not see why you do not call it a navy-yard; but I suppose a rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

Mr. FOSS. I suggest to the gentleman that it is now called a navy-yard.

Mr. CANNON. I think it ought to be.

Mr. DAYTON. The name of it is "navy-yard," and I shall move to strike out the words "naval station" and call it "navy-yard, Puget Sound."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How does it get the name of "station?"

Mr. DAYTON. It was a station, but it is now designated in the Department as a yard.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word about it. In the report accompanying this bill, "Naval station, Puget Sound, real estate and chattels, $941,000; machinery and plant, $255,000." I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or any gentleman who has the knowledge, how much is it contemplated that this navy-yard will cost when completed?

Mr. FOSS. Well, that is impossible to state. We can not tell what circumstances may arise; but I would say, for instance, in this bill we appropriate $748,000. That will practically complete, I think, the navy-yard. It will give them all the buildings they will need for a year or two anyway. Of course navy-yards are growing all the time. We expend money from year to year for them. That is necessary by reason of the fact that we may have to have new buildings or we may have to repair or reconstruct old buildings. It depends largely upon the amount of work that will be required to be done there. Puget Sound is likely to become the most important navy-yard on the Pacific coast. It is nearer to Japan and the Philippines than Mare Island, and has a great depth of water. The ships will naturally go there to be repaired in the future. As the work increases, and as the Navy increases, and as we have more ships upon the sea, consequently we have more going back into these navy-yards to be repaired, and necessarily we will have to increase the appropriations somewhat for these navy-yards and stations.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say just a word about this navy-yard. It seems to me that God made this location for a navy-yard. There is no danger of detrition, no danger of any falling in behind.

Mr. DAYTON. Not the slightest.

Mr. CANNON. And it seems to me that we all admit of Puget Sound that it is an admirable location. I wish I could say that of all the navy-yards on the Pacific coast and on the Atlantic coast. I want also to compliment the Department on the improvements that are made at Bremerton, at this navy-yard. A great dock, up to date, shops, not yet complete, but no wasteful expenditure made. Now, we have officers' quarters, as there ought to be, sufficient to be comfortable, but modest and not extravagant. As I look over this list I find there are 15 navy-yards on our coast. I wish there were but three.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman does not mean "navy-yards."

Mr. CANNON. Well, practically.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, they are really little stations—coaling stations.

Mr. CANNON. Portsmouth.

Mr. FOSS. A navy-yard.

Mr. CANNON. A stone's throw from Boston.

Mr. FOSS. Forty miles. The gentleman may be able to throw a stone that far.

Mr. CANNON. Naval station, New London.

Mr. FOSS. That is a little coaling station down there.

Mr. CANNON. New York; League Island; Washington.

Mr. FOSS. That is a gun shop, not a navy-yard.

Mr. CANNON. Norfolk; naval station, Port Royal.

Mr. FOSS. We have abandoned that.

Mr. CANNON. A million dollars of real estate and chattels, $70,000 machinery. Lot of real estate and chattels for the machinery. Scolded it, scolded it, year after year, but still the money went in. Now it is transferred to Charleston.

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I trust the Government will have better luck at Charleston.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; if I may have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSS. That Port Royal station was established many years ago, before most of the members upon the Naval Committee came here.

Mr. CANNON. I am not scolding the Navy Committee.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; you are not scolding. That was established when my colleague was a member of this House. Now, I am informed that the location of the site was largely on account of political influences. It was never well established, I believe——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's time being extended? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FOSS. But this committee, realizing that it was not well established, as the gentleman very well knows, acceded to a proposition which came from the other side of Congress, transferring this naval station to Charleston, which is better fitted for a navy-yard.

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I want just a minute. I want to conclude this matter, and then if I have any time I will yield. Now, here is the naval station at Key West, $851,000; one at Pensacola, $1,781,000; Mare Island Navy-Yard, $5,870,000, and $660 for machinery; then comes the station at Puget Sound. Then comes one, I believe, at New Orleans. Now, there is too much station, too much navy-yard, in my judgment. I believe the service of the Government would be best promoted by reducing them. New York, the great city, has a navy-yard which is a great necessity, a great supply of labor. At Norfolk we have had from the beginning a large expenditure. Now, the next navy-yard after these two—and I am not going to abuse League Island; you have got it and you can't cut it out.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It has the only fresh-water basin on the coast for the storage of vessels.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes, a very good excuse. I will not enter upon that, but one of the three great navy-yards in this country ought to be, from an economic standpoint, on Puget Sound, and I want to compliment the expenditure there. I wish I could do it for all the navy-yards. God gave the water there, and you do not have to spend half a million a year to get up to it at high tide. [Laughter.] I wish I could say that of all the navy-yards. I wish the navy-yard lower down on the Pacific coast was on San Francisco Bay, where you have got water. It will have to come to that sooner or later. How much that will add to the $6,000,000 already expended inland, practically, I do not know. I am not abusing anybody, but I think this navy-yard ought to be pushed as fast as the estimates are made for it. A little later on, as other questions may arise, I may desire to again be recognized for five minutes touching the proper function of navy-yards. As it is now, practically, it is a division of the dough among fifteen chickens [laughter] for the benefit of the locality in the various portions of the country. I do not believe it is good policy. This bill, I think, somewhat sins in pretty large expenditure in some places that ought not to be for the good of the service. But for fear I may turn myself into a common scold I will sit down. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I agree largely with my friend from Illinois, as I usually agree with him on most matters, and particularly with reference to the number of navy-yards and naval stations. So long as I have been a member of this committee I have tried to confine appropriations largely to the important navy-yards. I believe we should keep up a few navy-yards in the most efficient condition, and not seek to make them all first-class yards. But the gentleman knows, and we all of us know, that it is very difficult to carry out any well-settled line of policy in matters of this kind, because so many members are interested in what may be called, perhaps, selfish interests, inasmuch as these yards and stations are located in their States. I do not believe for one moment that we need two navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, one at Boston and one at Portsmouth, N. H., within 40 miles of each other.

I will join with my colleague and go down to the Secretary of the Navy, who hails from the State of Massachusetts, and ask him to close up the Boston Navy-Yard. [Laughter.] I will join with my friend from Illinois also in going to the distinguished Senator from Maine who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, and ask him to close up the yard at Portsmouth. [Laughter.] The gentleman knows just as well as I do that it is not likely that either one of these two navy-yards will be closed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Could we not close them out by not appropriating any money for them?

Mr. FOSS. We have certain conditions here; they exist and we must recognize them. The best that we can do is to do the work that we have before us and do it as well as we can, meeting as we may objections on the one side and upon the other, but hewing as near to the line of public economy and public frugality as is possible. So far as the committee is concerned, we believe in the future of Puget Sound. I myself, so far as Mare Island Navy-Yard is concerned, wish it were moved down to San Francisco Bay, but it is up there and it was established there 30 or 40 miles from San Francisco. Shall we close it up? There has been an expenditure there of $5,000,000——

Mr. CANNON. Six million.

Mr. FOSS. Some of our ships can be repaired there, not the largest battle ships, but some of the smaller ships. In the river and harbor bill there is provision made for the dredging of the channel so that in the future battle ships can go up there. Had we better turn our backs on the five or six million dollars which have been spent there during the last twenty or thirty years and go down to San Francisco Bay and establish a new naval station?

These are some of the considerations which entered into the minds of the committee. And while, if we had it in our power to establish new navy-yards and new naval stations we would make many changes and establish some where there are not any now (we could do so in many places in a more economical fashion) and take away others, yet we must put up with what we have and try to make the best of the matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In addition to the number of naval stations that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has alluded to that are more or less unnecessary, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the one at Cavite, P. I. The amount at the end of that paragraph amounts to $6,561,075. I have run through this bill, Mr. Chairman, in the last few minutes. And I find that there are a number of items——

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman does not suppose that we are appropriating $6,500,000 at Cavite? That is for the whole Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I said that at the foot of the paragraph of these items——

Mr. WHEELER. The aggregate which the gentleman has cited refers to the entire Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read these items. I do not want to mislead anyone.

Naval station, Cavite, P. I.: Tools and appliances for yards and docks, $5,000; fire-protection system and apparatus, $12,000; railroad system, improvements and extensions, $9,000; fitting up coal sheds, $7,500; toward the purchase or construction of a floating steel dry dock (of American manufacture) (to cost not to exceed $1,225,000), $200,000; in all, $233,500.

For the preparation of plans and specifications for public works, including such expert aids, draftsmen, writers, and copyists as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary, $30,000.

In all, public works, $6,561,075.

Mr. WHEELER. That is for the whole Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is under the head, "Naval station, Cavite, P. I." However, if the gentleman says I do not understand the bill correctly, I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the aggregate appropriation for the whole Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have been trying to get the amounts that this bill carries for our colonial possessions ever since the reading of the bill started. In order to save my friend the chairman of the committee from the trouble of adding up these matters, I have gone through them page by page to find out the result for myself. I will read it; it is very brief. Here, on page 18, is an item of $2,577.52 for an electrician and clerk. Then, on page 24, I find another item for Cavite—$2,460.60—for clerks, messenger, etc. Then, on the same page, I find an item for Hawaii—$1,747.25. On page 32 I find an item of $50,000 for coaling facilities, etc., at naval station, San Juan, P. R. Then, on page 34, I find the item already read, appropriating for tools, appliances, etc., and also for a floating steel dry dock, with other items, making in all $233,500.

The next paragraph reads, "in all, public works, $6,561,075." On pages 49–50 I find an item appropriating $15,800 for general storehouses, clerks, bookkeepers, etc., at Cavite, P. I. Then, on page 52, I find an appropriation of $50,000 for "construction plant, naval station, Cavite." On page 72 I find an item of $5,000 for buildings at Culebra, P. R. On page 24 is an item of $2,577 for the naval station at San Juan, P. R. On page 66 is an item of $2,800 for two clerks "for additional duty in the Philippines," and on pages 68–69 there is an item which appears to be an omnibus item including the Philippine Islands and the United States proper—$45,000.

Mr. FOSS. Do I understand the gentleman as reading from this bill to show that we are appropriating for our insular possessions $6,000,000?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is correct unless the paragraph on pages 34–35, under the head "Naval station, Cavite, Philippine Islands," is misunderstood by myself. I really hope that I do misunderstand it.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, the gentleman certainly misunderstands it.

Mr. WHEELER. I have already tried to explain that to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Kentucky did not explain it. I would like him to do so.

Mr. FOSS. The item on page 35, "In all, public works, $6,561,075" covers all the public works.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. FOSS. At all the different stations.

Mr. WHEELER. All over the world.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. At home and abroad?

Mr. FOSS. Let the gentleman refer to the paragraph on page 24, and he will find that the whole amount appropriated for public works at Cavite is $233,500.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, omitting the item of $6,561,075 on page 23, to which I have alluded, has the gentleman ascertained yet what the appropriation is in this bill for these insular possessions? I really would like to know. I am trying to find out, and I have added up the items.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the gentleman that the appropriations carried in this bill for naval stations have absolutely nothing on earth to do with the foreign policy of the United States Government, and I listened, expecting the chairman of the committee to state that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] about the naval yards, of which he read off a list of twelve or thirteen, was entirely erroneous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. It is the policy of the Navy to establish as many foreign naval stations as possible, and in the course of time I hope to see naval stations of the Federal Government in all parts of the world—in England, France, Germany, anywhere we can get a naval station. It is the part of wisdom to establish them, and for this reason, and I am sure the gentleman will agree with me: Under the present system ships are sailed by steam and not by cloth, and their radius of action depends upon the amount of coal in their bunkers; and these foreign naval stations are simply bases of supplies, principally for coal and incidentally for food and clothing and for ammunition; and the appropriation carried for foreign naval stations in this bill is entirely distinct from the foreign policy of the Government. I oppose the present foreign policy of the Government as earnestly as does the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is that foreign policy?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know. Nobody but God Almighty and the few Republican leaders know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say you are opposed to the policy, and yet you say you do not know what it is—that no one but the Lord knows.

Mr. WHEELER. I am very unfortunate. The gentleman has not his usual aptitude in grasping statements. I have iterated and reiterated that I was opposed to the foreign policy of the Federal Government; but I am in favor of establishing navy-yards, or naval stations, rather, in all parts of the world in order to render our Navy efficient on every sea, and that these items to which the gentleman seeks to call attention, making appropriations to maintain our foreign naval stations, have absolutely nothing to do with our insular possessions, except incidentally growing out of the fact that we have land in that portion of the world, and we are availing ourselves of that fact to establish naval stations for the purpose of equipping our vessels.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many naval stations do you want to establish in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me tell the gentleman what the Committee on Naval Affairs did. A proposition came before it, and was vigorously urged, to establish a great naval station at Cavite and another at Elongopore.

The one at Elongopore was to cost from $20,000,000 up, and the Committee on Naval Affairs went into it thoroughly, and while it was urged by some of the best officers in our Navy—and I think I betray no committee secret when I say what I shall—without regard to political complexion, recognizing that the question of the future of the Philippine Islands was yet undetermined, we, by tacit if not by open agreement, determined to appropriate just as little money as possible in the Philippine Islands, in order that our ships in those waters might be repaired in American docks, without having to go to Hongkong or Nagasaki, or to some foreign shipyard, and pay hundreds of thousands of dollars a year for docking and other privileges to foreign navy-yards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is that going to cost?

Mr. WHEELER. We have established a small dock at Cavite to cost about a million or perhaps two millions of dollars. We were told by the chief of one of the bureaus in whom we had confidence that with this dock we could get along for the present, and in my limited service on this committee I desire to say that I have never known a bill more carefully prepared and more carefully considered than this naval bill. Schemes of every sort, kind, and nature came before the committee, and it was pared down to the absolute needs of the Government, and I do not think there is an item in it that ought to go out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I am going to ask the gentleman, inasmuch as he is a member of the committee and has the floor, for I yield it to him and he can continue until he gets through, to go through the bill, inasmuch as the subject is now up, and tell us what these items are, what it cost, so that we can be thinking of them.

Mr. WHEELER. To what items does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will give you the pages. We have already come to what page?

Mr. WHEELER. Thirty-two.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, on pages 34 and 35. That is the item just read. Now turn to pages 49 and 50.

Mr. WHEELER. What does the gentleman desire to know about that particular item on page 34?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have already explained that.

Mr. WHEELER. What is the other?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The other is at pages 49 and 50. How much is that? Explain as you go along.

Mr. WHEELER. What item does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. At the bottom of the page, beginning at line 22.

Mr. WHEELER. Naval station, Cavite, Philippine Islands. That relates to the civil establishment there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does that cost?

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will see the footing at the end of the item, "in all, $15,800." That is the clerical force for this dry dock and the houses and buildings and officers and men at that place.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, there is one item on page 52:

Construction plant, naval station, Cavite, P. I.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the same thing. Will the gentleman listen to me for a moment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Under the bureau system of the Federal Government, in the Navy Department every bureau has a different force, and this bill carries appropriations by bureaus. It is aggregated only toward the last.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are these improvements to be temporary, or are they permanent?

Mr. WHEELER. They are of necessity permanent in their nature; but if in the future it be determined that we are to leave those islands to those people, then they will turn out to be temporary. The dry dock of course is temporary, since it is a floating one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to correct the total in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the total will be amended to correspond with the amendment just adopted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAYTON. On page 31, in line 15, I move to strike out the words "naval station" and insert the word "navy-yard," changing the title of the yard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to page 31 and strike out the words "naval station" in line 15 and insert the word "navy-yard." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, public works, $6,561,075.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, we have added to the appropriation for public works one item of $60,000 and one item of $75,000, making a total addition of $135,000. I ask that the Clerk may be authorized to correct the total.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the total may be changed in accordance with the amendments which have been adopted by the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS—BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Naval Academy: Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Toward the construction of buildings and for other necessary improvements at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., as authorized by the act of Congress approved June 7, 1900, and in accordance with the plans approved by the Secretary of the Navy October 3, 1900, and toward the construction of a hospital (to cost not more than $100,000), to be built upon plans approved by the Secretary of the Navy; for dredging up to and in front of the Naval Academy, $200,000; $500,000, the amount hereby appropriated to constitute a part of the $8,000,000 limit fixed for the total cost of said buildings and improvements.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that after the word "Navy," in line 15, page 35, the words "three hundred thousand dollars" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Navy," in line 15, page 35, insert the words "three hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. FOSS. And also in line 17, just before the word "five," and after the semicolon, insert the words "in all."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is disposed of——

The CHAIRMAN. It is disposed of. It has been agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON. That will appropriate $300,000 for the hospital, will it not?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no. It says:

Toward the construction of buildings, and for other necessary improvements—

And so forth—

and toward the construction of a hospital (to cost not more than $100,000)—

That is, toward the construction of all these things, $300,000; and for dredging up to and in front of the Naval Academy, $200,000; in all, $500,000. That is all right.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question. I understand that the sum of $8,000,000 is set aside for the construction of a Naval Academy. The other day I noticed an item in a paper—sometimes they make mistakes, like other fallible beings—stating that the chapel being constructed at Annapolis was to cost $400,000. I should be glad to ask my friend if he has any knowledge about that?

Mr. FOSS. I would say to the gentleman that I first heard of it, I think, through the newspapers, that there was a proposition afloat to build a chapel there. I afterwards learned that the idea was to have a memorial hall, where could be gathered together trophies of our naval victories and one thing and another. I heard that was in prospect, and when I first heard of it I went immediately to the Secretary of the Navy and entered a protest against a proposition to build a chapel or a hall to cost $400,000. I may say the Secretary told me that he held the matter up at that time. He had felt somewhat the same himself; and as I understand it, at the present time the Navy Department has decided not to go ahead with the plan or scheme that would include a chapel with that expenditure of money.

Mr. MUDD. Just a word. I suppose I ought to be heard on the question of the chapel at the Naval Academy.

Mr. CANNON. I just wanted to know.

Mr. MUDD. Especially on the chapel. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in confirmation of what the chairman of the committee has said, that when I first saw the statement in the newspapers of Baltimore City that the chapel that was to be constructed at the Naval Academy was to cost $400,000, I went forthwith to the Secretary of the Navy and protested against that degree of luxury in the worship of God.

Mr. CANNON. For a more democratic form?

Mr. MUDD. Yes; I wanted a more democratic form of religion; and the Secretary, upon his attention being called to the matter—I rather think the plan had been perfected, including the construction of a memorial hall at $400,000—immediately ordered that no contract of that kind should be made.

Mr. CANNON. How much is it to cost?

Mr. MUDD. The question of the cost of the chapel is now a matter that has been suspended. I do not think there is any idea, after his attention has been called to it, of that being done.

Mr. CANNON. Honors ought to be distributed even. They proposed a chapel at West Point at $200,000. That was cut down, in my recollection, to not more than $100,000.

Mr. DAYTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that a couple of weeks ago I was at Annapolis, and went over the plans with the Board of Visitors. The use of the word "chapel" was a very unfortunate one. The building was designed not only for use as a memorial hall, but as a commencement hall. It was in accord with the plans of the buildings, and after these plans had been thoroughly examined by 12 men that were there, including Senators GALLINGER and TALIAFERRO, it was thought that the proper designation of the building itself should not be chapel, carrying the idea with it that it was simply a church or a place for religious gatherings, but it should be called the "auditorium building," where all their meetings should be held. But, as the chairman has said, this building is not to be erected now, and the question will not come up at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Is it to be erected out of the $8,000,000?

Mr. DAYTON. If erected at all it will be a part of the eight-million plan. The little chapel that they have now accommodates about 200 people. This is designed to accommodate 1,200 or 1,500 people, that may gather on commencement occasions, and by building it in conformity with the plan of the buildings as a memorial hall, where the trophies—flags of the vessels that have been in war—shall be maintained. But, as I say, 12 men, coming from all over the country, were of the opinion that the plan ought not to be adopted. The building is not to be erected now, and the question will come up on some future bill.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend have any knowledge as to what the architect's fees are to be on this $8,000,000 expenditure?

Mr. MUDD. Does the gentleman ask that question of me?

Mr. CANNON. Either one.

Mr. MUDD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I understand that the architect has been paid 5 per cent for the work that has been done in accordance with his plans.

Mr. CANNON. That is $400,000, I believe.

Mr. MUDD. I understood that about the time we were discussing the plans of the building. I have not heard anything about it since. I have thought upon this point that he has been rather luxuriantly dealt with.

Mr. CANNON. My friend does not propose to change the title to "An appropriation for the benefit of the Navy and the architects of the country?" [Laughter.]

Mr. MUDD. Well, I have no objection to any such proposition being made, if the gentleman will find it feasible to do so. I am not concerned about the architect, but I am about the Naval Academy.

Mr. VANDIVER. Let me ask the gentleman a question, with his permission. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Illinois has read the hearings of the committee, and especially the statement of the Secretary of the Navy on that question?

Mr. CANNON. No; if I had I would not have asked.

Mr. MUDD. I do not think there is anything of that kind contemplated. I had prepared an amendment, and offered it in the committee, that the cost of any new building that may be erected for the purposes of a chapel be limited to $100,000, which I would regard as a reasonable amount; but on what I had reason to regard as an assurance that nothing of the kind as such an expenditure for a chapel was contemplated I did not think it was well to insist upon the amendment.

Mr. COWHERD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not the purpose of the design to complete the building at a cost of $400,000?

Mr. MUDD. Well, as to the question whether or not the chapel or place for religious worship will be placed in a building that will cost $400,000, I do not know.

Mr. COWHERD. Have not the plans been practically approved, and are they not simply held up awaiting appropriations?

Mr. MUDD, Oh, no; they do not depend on future appropriations. The plans are prepared, but upon the Secretary's attention being called to this matter he ordered that no plan of that kind would be approved for a chapel.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, California (buildings): One double set of officers' quarters, $12,000; sinking artesian wells and water supply, $7,500; roads and grounds, $3,500; purchase of tools and fitting up machine shop, $2,500; installation of cold-storage room, originally planned, $3,500; building boathouse and carpenter shop on wharf, $2,500; in all, $31,500.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I have just received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the matter. On line 22, page 35, instead of the words "one double set of officers' quarters, $12,000," I move that those words be stricken out and in the place of them insert "two officers' quarters, $12,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about that. I notice a little later on at training station at Rhode Island, "a double set of officers' quarters, $36,000." Now, a training station is a place where you instruct the boys. Am I right?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The proof comes right along that, in the name of instruction and education, comfortable places are established to spend the summer months at the public expense on the part of men that ought to be on sea.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to put into the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to these officers' quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the letter will be printed in the RECORD. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 16, 1902.

SIR: Referring to the item "one double set of officers' quarters, to be immediately available, $12,000," under the heading "Public works, Bureau of Navigation," subheading "Naval training station, California, buildings," included in the estimates for the naval establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903 (see p. 223, Estimates and appropriations, 1903) I have the honor to inclose herewith, for the information and consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a copy of a letter dated the 12th instant, from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in which he recommends, at the instance of the commandant of the naval training station, San Francisco, the modification of the above-mentioned estimate, so as to permit of the construction of two small separate houses, at the same cost, instead of one double house, as originally contemplated. In view of the statements of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, I have the honor to request that the wording of the above-mentioned item be changed so as to read as follows: "Two officers' quarters, to be immediately available, $12,000, and the cost of said quarters shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated."

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1902.

SIR: The estimates submitted by this Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, contain an item under "Naval training station, San Francisco, buildings," for "one double set of officers' quarters, to be immediately available, $12,000."

2. In a letter received this day the commandant of that station recommends that two small separate houses be built instead of one double house, as the location on which the new quarters must necessarily be placed is not suited for a single building of such a large area, which would necessitate expensive grading, and "detached houses are much more desirable for comfort and sanitary reasons."

3. The commandant submits plans and estimates of the cost of two small separate houses within the amount contained in the Bureau's estimates, already submitted, viz, $12,000.

4. It is therefore recommended that if, in the opinion of the Department, it is necessary in order to contract for two separate officers' quarters Congress be requested to change the wording of this estimate as follows: "Two officers' quarters, to be immediately available, $12,000."

Respectfully,

H. C. TAYLOR, Chief of Bureau.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

New England naval magazine: The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to appoint a board of naval officers whose duty it shall be to recommend a suitable site or sites for one naval magazine on the New England coast, between Boston and Portsmouth, suitable for the use of the Boston and Portsmouth navy-yards, and, if upon private land, to estimate its value and ascertain as nearly as practicable the cost for which it can be purchased or acquired, and also to estimate the cost of necessary buildings, grading and filling in, building roads and walks, improvement of water front, necessary wharves and cranes, railroad tracks and rolling stock, fire and water service, and for general equipment of said naval magazine.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that paragraph. It is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, desire to be heard on the point of order? It seems to the Chair it is perfectly clear that it is against the rule.

Mr. FOSS. If it seems perfectly clear to the Chair I do not think there is any necessity of discussing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The board shall make a full and detailed report to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall transmit such report, with his recommendations thereon, to the next session of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. That goes out upon the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That goes out with the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Quarters, Rose Island, Narragansett Bay: Quarters for watchmen and gunners, $5,200.

Mr. CANNON. Quarters for watchmen and gunners, Rose Island, Narragansett Bay. What do they do there?

Mr. FOSS. Rose Island is a naval magazine at Newport where large quantities of gun cotton and powder are stored coming from various sources. It is cut off from the mainland; being on an island no dwellings are there except that of the light-house keeper. It is absolutely necessary that the gunner and watchman should have quarters, as they must remain on the island night and day. There is no provision there for proper shelter.

Mr. CANNON. What do they do? The seacoast defenses are under the Army.

Mr. FOSS. These watchmen remain there looking after Government property.

Mr. CANNON. Is this a part of the War College?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; this is a naval magazine. It is no part of the War College at all.

Mr. DAYTON. It is filled with powder and gun cotton, and these men have to watch it.

Mr. FOSS. They have to watch it to keep trespassers off the ground and away from the magazine.

Mr. CANNON. Still, I do not see what you want of gunners down there to watch ammunition. There is no shooting to do.

Mr. DAYTON. The gunners, in naval nomenclature, are the men having charge of the powder and ammunition. He is not the man that shoots the gun, but he is the one having charge of the ammunition which is stored.

Mr. CANNON. There is a powder magazine there, as I understand it.

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. How expensive is it?

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, there are just a few things that I happen to know something about in this bill, and this is one of them. Rose Island is an isolated island, not inhabited, and because it is so isolated and because it is not inhabited it has been selected as a proper place for storing large quantities of ammunition and high explosives, so that they may be ready for supply for the Navy, as the fleets may come to that port. At the torpedo station is a manufactory of smokeless powder. That is very dangerous, and it is stored at Rose Island as soon as manufactured. Gun cotton, also very dangerous, has to be cared for by a man who has scientific knowledge of the handling of gun cotton. That is an officer known in the Navy as a gunner. He is assigned to that duty, and has charge of and superintendence of this ammunition, and as he can not keep awake day and night and Sunday, they provide a watchman to assist him. The watchman and gunner have got to live and have an abiding place. It is not a delightful place to live.

Mr. CANNON. There is no place there for them to live?

Mr. CAPRON. There is no place, no shelter, and this appropriation is to supply a place.

Mr. CANNON. This is an isolated place with no shelter for these men. I am delighted to hear my friend make such a lucid and clear explanation of the matter, and evidently it is a proper expenditure.

Mr. CAPRON. Undoubtedly. I am not proposing to increase the expenditure because the gentleman is so agreeable. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Observatory: For grounds and roads; continuing grading, extending roads and paths, clearing and improving grounds, $5,000.

In all, Naval Observatory, $5,000.

Mr. FOSS. I move to amend by striking out in the clause just read the clause "In all, Naval Observatory, $5,000."

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval hospital fund: For maintenance of the naval hospitals at the various navy-yards and stations, and for care and maintenance of patients in other hospitals at home and abroad, $40,000. From and after July 1, 1900, all forfeitures on account of desertion shall be passed to the credit of the naval hospital fund.

Mr. CANNON. I make a point of order on the last clause of the paragraph as just read—

From and after July 1, 1900, all forfeitures on account of desertion shall be passed to the credit of the naval hospital fund.

I submit that this is new legislation. I hope I may be allowed just a word. In my opinion the naval hospitals, along with all the other branches of the public service, should be cared for by annual appropriations. I do not believe it is wise legislation to devote anything as a permanent fund here and there, because in such cases Congress does not keep the whip hand of the expense year by year. We have more than $100,000,000 of permanent appropriations for the public service—a most vicious policy. I wish I had the power to repeal every one of those provisions. For these reasons, and because this is new legislation, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision is clearly subject to a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

Construction and repair of vessels: For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; steam steerers, pneumatic steerers, steam capstans, steam windlasses, and all other auxiliaries; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; purchase of machinery and tools for use in shops; carrying on work of experimental model tank; designing naval vessels; construction and repair of yard craft, lighters and barges for use at home stations; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat; general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses, such as advertising, freight, foreign postage, telegrams, telephone service, photographing, books, professional magazines, plans, stationery, and instruments for drafting room, $8,000,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repair of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 10 per cent of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in lines 6 and 7, page 51, as just read, I find these words:

Construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges for use at home stations.

These words have never appeared in this bill before. I would be glad to know the necessity for such a provision.

Mr. FOSS. The "construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges" has heretofore been done by the Bureau of Equipment. This is a transfer of the work from one bureau to another, putting it under the control of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, which has charge of all the floating material, so to speak.

Mr. CANNON. Is the provision struck out at the other place?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; in effect.

Mr. CANNON. I am with the gentleman in the purpose he is seeking to accomplish. I desire that all yard craft and lighters necessary for the service be furnished, whether under the Bureau of Construction and Repair, or under the Bureau of Equipment, or under any other bureau.

But I do not want the House to make appropriations for any pleasure boats. We find that in reference to every bit of expenditure, in connection even with the marine hospitals, or the Revenue-Cutter Service, or the Light-House Service, where only cents are appropriated while here dollars are appropriated, we are obliged to watch the appropriations with a magnifying glass and also a telescope to keep the expenditures down to absolute necessities. Now, here the door is wide open.

Mr. FOSS. This was simply a question between the two bureaus—the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Construction and Repair. In the course of the settling of this question it came up before the Secretary of the Navy, who, in a decision which I have here, held that the construction and repair of the yard craft ought to be under the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope my friend the chairman of the committee will not make that statement quite so broad. This item is for "construction," and would authorize the construction of any number of yard craft and lighters, as well as the repair of them. The repair, as the gentleman properly states, was formerly under another bureau; but the work of construction up to this day has never been authorized except by separate appropriation items in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. If that is so, does not my friend think we had better adhere to the old practice?

Mr. DAYTON. I can say to the gentleman that I bitterly opposed this proposition, but was overruled by the committee, and of course I yielded gracefully.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to inquire whether any inconvenience or disadvantage or any improper expenditure to the service has resulted by reason of the existing practice.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, I do not know that any inconvenience whatever has ever resulted. This was simply a little question between two bureaus. Under the general law touching the Navy Department the Secretary of the Navy has the right and the power to divide up the work of naval administration among these different bureaus. He can take the work from one and give it to another.

Now, after considering this question—after the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment had presented his case and the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair had presented his, the Secretary of the Navy thought proper to decide that the construction and repair of the small craft should all be under one bureau and that it should be the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Now, so far as my position is concerned, I have always felt that when a matter of that kind has been decided down there between the two bureaus, decided by the responsible head of the Navy Department, the man whom we hold responsible for the efficiency of the naval service, that as a committee we ought to take his judgment on the matter.

Mr. CANNON. Is my friend satisfied that practically the construction and repair does not enlarge the discretion that exists somewhere in the bureaus and that by the decision of the Secretary of the Navy practically it will be that the whole of the construction and repair of yard craft will be under the Bureau of Construction and Repair?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then I have no further questions to ask.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the House to be misled in regard to this matter. I would ask the chairman of the committee if he does not understand that this item has not heretofore been in the bill, and that it authorizes any number of lighters or barges to be constructed.

Mr. FOSS. Not any more, I think, than could be built before.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that on one or two appropriation bills heretofore we have refused separate appropriations for lighters—turned down such appropriations. These vessels cost from $70,000 to $100,000. This provides that any number of them may be constructed, and the objection I am making is the general authority without any specific appropriation being made. I call the attention of the chairman [Mr. FOSS] to that, and I would say that I stood with the committee when it overruled me, but I thought this too general and sweeping in its character.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman what is included in the terms "yard craft?"

Mr. FOSS. Oh, small boats.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understand that the regulations include tugs, launches, boats, lighters, and barges used for towing and transportation, etc. If that is true, you have a duplication of appropriation here, because under yard craft you provide for tugs, lighters, and barges, and you also provide in the same line for lighters and barges, and then further along in your bill, on page 52, you provide for two steel tugs for general service. Now, if yard craft includes tugs, I do not see why you can not use this whole appropriation for the construction of tugs if your Bureau of Construction and Repair sees fit.

It seems to me you have a duplication of items, and if it is true that the Secretary of the Navy now has the power to distribute this work as he sees fit, in accordance with what is judicious and wise, what is the occasion for changing it in the appropriation bill? Why not leave it within the intelligent discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, especially in view of the fact that you now have your bureau in charge of a new Secretary of the Navy, and leave him to take up these matters as matters of new impression? Under the circumstance, will not the chairman of the committee consent to striking out these items? It seems to me you will have the Navy Department now under the administration of this new Secretary, without his being foreclosed by a clause in the appropriation bill, or even by the suggestion of the preceding Secretary of the Navy. I know very little about the practical detail, but of course you do not want to duplicate items in your appropriatiou bill, do you?

Mr. FOSS. No; and I do not think there is any duplication. That is to say, you take, for instance, two steel tugs for general service——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yard craft, as I understand it, include all tugs.

Mr. FOSS. Those are large tugs.

Mr. ROBERTS. Confined to station and yard.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The definition of yard craft in the regulations of the United States Navy, regulation, page 245, section 12, is as follows:

All tugs—

And that includes all kinds of tugs—launches, boats, lighters, and barges, used for towing or transportation purposes, not including derricks and cranes, etc.

Well, you do not use tugs for any other purpose than for transportation and towing. It is not confined to yards or any place or locality, but yard craft include all tugs under the definition. Of course, I do not know where you got your definition of this language in the bill, but it must be from your naval regulations. My suggestion is that if the chairman is correct, and I have no doubt that he is, that this is a matter largely under the control and under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, inasmuch as this never has been in the appropriation bill before, and the service so far as we know in this respect has been going on very satisfactorily to the Government—nobody has been disturbed and the expenditures have been wise and judicious, there has been no friction or difficulty—that now, having a new head of the Department, why limit it——

Mr. FOSS. That is just the trouble.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let him get the benefit of his experience.

Mr. FOSS. There has been a good deal of friction between the two bureaus, as I understand it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It has not been disclosed here. I do not know what the fact may be in that respect.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, yes; you will find a whole lot of correspondence on the subject.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The chairman has not disclosed it in his statement. I know nothing about the controversy, if indeed there has been a controversy.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; the controversy came up before the Secretary of the Navy, and he made a recommendation and sent in this language in the estimate in order to settle the controversy.

Mr. CAPRON. This is the way the Secretary wants it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understand that the heads of the various bureaus make their estimates and they go before the Secretary of the Navy and he approves the estimates. Whether or not he paid special attention to this particular item, and therefore it carries with it his personal approval, is something I do not know. As I understand the method of doing business in the Navy Department, all these bureau heads make up their estimates, and they do not come before your committee until they are certified by the Secretary of the Navy. Am I right about that?

Mr. FOSS. That is right.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then, this is simply a formal certification. If that is so, in my judgment it does not establish the propriety of the change. It seems to me unless some special reason is assigned for the change—unless the public service has suffered on account of existing conditions—there is no occasion certainly for embarrassing the incoming administration or any of the people in the Bureau by a change in the law. This is, I take it, a change in existing law.

Mr. CAPRON. Only a regulation.

Mr. FOSS. It is only a matter of regulation, from one bureau to another.

Mr. CAPRON. But in this instance, as I understand it, the Secretary has settled it—has made this recommendation to the committee—and the committee are carrying out the recommendation of the Secretary.

Mr. DAYTON. If the gentleman will pardon an interruption——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. The fundamental trouble about the whole business is that under this general provision—construction and repair of this class of vessels—the Bureau of Construction could expend the whole $8,000,000 in building tugs and lighters and that kind of craft that heretofore we have refused to appropriate for and have cut out of every appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There can not be any doubt about that under the construction of the bill.

Mr. CAPRON. If they spend the entire sum on tugs or lighters, it will have to be done under the authority and by direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very likely.

Mr. CAPRON. I dare risk the discretion of the Secretary, under this or any other method.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Don't you dare risk the discretion of the Secretary by striking out this item and leaving the provision as it has been since 1789?

Mr. CAPRON. I would rather have it as the Secretary wants it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to see the language of the Secretary of the Navy, in which he in terms requests this change to be made.

Mr. FOSS. I will let the gentleman read the decision of the Secretary of the Navy, or I will read it myself.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like the specific language of the Secretary of the Navy, in which he asks the Naval Committee to make this change in the bill.

Mr. FOSS. That is in the Book of Estimates sent up to the committee at the beginning of the session.

Mr. ROBERTS. If the gentleman will pardon me——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield the floor?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; for an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask that my time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] is recognized.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman wants to give me information which I am very anxious to get.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, the question at issue here came up in this way: The Bureau of Equipment heretofore has had the repairing of craft under its jurisdiction. All the time there has been a Bureau of Construction and Repair in the Navy Department. The repairing of the vessels under the Equipment Bureau was leading up to a duplication of construction and repair plants in the Navy Department, and it was leading to friction between the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Construction and Repair——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Leading to?

Mr. ROBERTS. There was friction, and it was leading to still more. The Bureau of Construction and Repair claimed that all these constructions and repairs for its own department and all other departments should be done by its men with its machinery.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Done where?

Mr. ROBERTS. Done by the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Wherever it happened to have a plant?

Mr. ROBERTS. Wherever it happened to have a plant. That state of affairs led to so much friction that finally the chiefs of the bureaus took the question before the Secretary of the Navy; and in the hearing, or in the communications before the committee, you will find correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and the chiefs of these two bureaus; and coupled with that correspondence you will find the decision, in writing, of the Secretary of the Navy that this work ought to be done under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Construction and Repair in the interest of economy rather than to have the two bureaus doing this same kind of work.

Now, this question was settled by the Secretary of the Navy in the interest of harmony in the Navy Department and in the interest of economy in the administration of its affairs, and it seems to me it will be very unwise indeed for Congress to change this bill in this respect and in terms overrule the action of the Secretary of the Navy in a purely executive matter in his Department. It will send the whole question back into the bureaus, and the same state of friction and ill feeling will arise again that has been or now should be laid. This definitive action of Congress should settle, in this bill, where and in what bureau these repairs and constructions shall be carried on.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, he is just the gentleman on the committee that I want to get the information from. He says the Secretary of the Navy has made this ruling in the interest of harmony and saving expense, and he speaks of the correspondence. Now, I would be glad to have him call my attention to the language of the Secretary of the Navy in this letter in which he gives the reason for making this change. Of course I am simply asking for information. If the gentleman will ascertain and read to me the portion of the letter in which he gives as the reason for making such a recommendation, if he makes a recommendation, that it is in order to avoid friction and save expense, I will be glad. And while he is looking it up, as it may take a few minutes, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, also in the line of information, whether the Bureau of Construction and Repair has a plant so situated that it can construct for the Bureau of Equipment these barges and lighters that are used by it, and whether they are so distributed as to be available by that Bureau?

Mr. FOSS. They have them at the home stations. Of course this money only applies to home stations. At foreign stations they have not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Why does not the same business proposition apply as much abroad as at home?

Mr. FOSS. Because they would probably have to be constructed by private parties.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Have to be purchased?

Mr. FOSS. I mean they would have to be purchased. Now, this language only applies to home stations, where we have a plant for construction and repairs.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the chairman of the committee the further question, whether or not this bill does still leave it within the power of the Bureau of Equipment to construct and repair the lighters and barges? I understand that it does.

Mr. FOSS. That I do not know.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, let me just call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this fact and show that it does. Here is a portion of this bill which reads as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Coal and transportation: For purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, and other equipment purposes, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same $2,500,000.

Now, I call especial attention to this clause "including expenses of transportation." Upon that the Judge-Advocate-General of the Department held on December 23, 1897, as follows:

In my opinion the purchase of the within-mentioned coal lighter can properly be made from the appropriation "Equipment of vessels, 1898," digest of naval appropriations, page 13," for purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expense of transportation, storage, and handling the same," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to amend by striking out the language under discussion, on page 51. That, I believe, is an amendment not now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an informal amendment now pending. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. To expedite matters, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine may continue his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair desires to know is if the gentleman from Maine simply offers another pro forma amendment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I simply desire by unanimous consent to continue the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the extension of the gentleman's time for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine wanted some information regarding the action of Secretary Long in the matter of these yard craft, and so on. I find in a communication dated Navy Department, July 22, 1901—and I will say that this is a decision of the Secretary after having before him the correspondence of the bureaus of Equipment and Construction and Repair of the question as to which bureau should have the repair of these vessels. He says:

The general principle is plain that the construction and repair of vessels are provided for under a specific appropriation for those purposes—"Repair of vessels afloat," "Increase of the Navy in the line of construction and repair." By the regulations of the Department the business of this appropriation is assigned to the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Under it vessels are now repaired and barges, steam launches, and boats constructed. No departure from this arrangement should be adopted which would lead to the setting up of any separate establishment in any other bureau for that work. The Bureau of Equipment recognizes this and especially disclaims any intention to the contrary.

The Department is of the opinion that the appropriation for construction and repair of vessels applies to all sorts of naval vessels, and that the rule above suggested should stand as the general rule. If, therefore, Equipment requires a barge, or Ordnance a lighter, or Yards and Docks a tug—although each one of these bureaus has a general appropriation for transportation—such vessels should be built by Construction and Repair and paid for out of its specific appropriation for construction. Any of these three bureaus may define the sort of vessel it requires, and the Bureau of Construction and Repair will construct accordingly. If it fails to act with due diligence, or to conform to the proper requirements, the Department will at once, upon notice of that fact, take the necessary action.

Then he goes on with additional reasons. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the testimony of Secretary Long when before the committee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will excuse me, I would rather he address himself to answering my question, which was, Where and in what language the Secretary had assigned as a reason under the law for making the change that there was friction in the Department, and that it would save expense to transfer the construction and repair from one bureau to another? I am familiar with the letter which the gentleman has read, but in that no such reason is assigned, and the gentleman did not succeed in reading it into the letter, nor could he, because it is not there. That is the matter that I am anxious to be informed about. If there is anything on file from the Secretary of the Navy giving as a reason that there was friction between the bureaus and that it would save expense in the Navy Department, I would like to have it pointed out.

Mr. ROBERTS. Either the gentleman misunderstood me or I misunderstood him. I never stated that there was a letter on file from the Secretary of the Navy in which he assigned as a cause of his action that there was friction which had grown up between the bureaus, but that is a matter of common knowledge.

Mr LITTLEFIELD. Does the Secretary of the Navy assign that as a reason in his testimony?

Mr. ROBERTS. Among those who know the condition of affairs it is well known that that is the state of facts. That is brought out by the testimony of Admiral Bradford and Admiral Bowles. They do not give that as the reason in those exact words, but that is the substance of it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did not ask the gentleman about Admiral Bradford or Admiral Bowles or anybody connected with the Navy Department. I want the information on that precise point, which is, whether the Secretary of the Navy has given those two reasons for making the change. If the gentleman has any knowledge upon that point, I would be glad to know it. The gentleman concedes that he has not, and therefore so far as this is concerned the matter stands without any reason being given. I submit that under the ruling of the Judge-Advocate-General this appropriation is duplicated in this bill; that the lighters, yard craft, and tugs can be constructed and repaired in both the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and so far as the Department is concerned no reason has been assigned for the change. Under these circumstances I move to strike out that language.

Mr. ROBERTS. The whole correspondence here is a reason for the change. Here is the testimony of Admiral Bowles:

The CHAIRMAN. We will start with the first paragraph, "Construction and repair of vessels." The language is the same until we reach the fourth line, and then there are some new words, "Construction and repair," and "Repair of lighters and barges." Will you kindly explain the necessity for putting that in?

Admiral BOWLES. The practice has grown up for the various bureaus in the Navy Department to do purchasing and repairing for their own purposes of various barges, coal barges, water barges, and lighters. The Bureau of Construction and Repair reported to the Navy Department that the system was objectionable upon two grounds:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is Admiral Bowles?

Mr. ROBERTS. This is Admiral Bowles:

One was that it was illegal, and the other that it was uneconomical and inexpedient. It was illegal because there was a specific appropriation for construction and repair of vessels, and vessels are defined by the Revised Statutes, which covers all these lighters and barges.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He is the new head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

The other ground was that the Bureau of Construction and Repair maintained a plant with a foreman and skilled mechanics, and an organization for the purpose of doing this work, and it would be better where a bureau has such facilities.

These facts being represented that it was objectionable that these two bureaus should be doing this same kind of work, there is where the inference, and a very broad one, that there was friction between the bureaus came about. It is well known to those familiar with the Department that there was friction. I do not know that the Secretary of the Navy ever gave that as a reason, but that is the whole purport of this correspondence, and it was the desire to stop that friction.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The whole purport of the statement of Admiral Bowles, who is at the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and who has recently taken charge of it, is that he simply wants to aggrandize this Bureau at the expense of some other bureau. That is Admiral Bowles's opinion; that is all.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have given the gentleman the statement of facts.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You have read from Admiral Bowles's statement.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have given you the action of Secretary Long in deciding this controversy.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; in which he does not allude to a single one of the reasons which the gentleman at first presented.

Mr. ROBERTS. Does the gentleman from Maine expect that the head of a great Department is going to put into a document which goes on file the petty bickerings of different branches of the Department on which he is called to decide?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will tell the gentleman what I expect. I expect that when he gets up here and tells us that the Secretary of the Navy has made certain statements he will substantiate what he says.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will say to the gentleman that he misunderstood me, or that I myself was under a misunderstanding, if I said there was any such letter.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I stand by the record on that.

Mr. ROBERTS. You have now a record in which I declare that I did not mean to say that the Secretary of the Navy had put that in writing.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That disposes, then, of that element of the controversy. The Secretary of the Navy makes no such assertion.

I think it is very clear, Mr. Chairman, that this item is a duplication of appropriations in some other part of the bill. I do not know that this is a matter in which the Committee of the Whole takes any consuming interest; but I move to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, page 51, the words "construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges for use at home stations."

The amendment of Mr. LITTLEFIELD was read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this Committee of the Whole will make a very serious mistake if it should adopt the motion of the gentleman from Maine. This whole controversy has been gone over time and again inside the Navy Department, and it has finally been settled within the year by the Secretary of the Navy, where this construction should be done—under what bureau. And I think I am not violating any confidence of the committee when I say that this whole fight, as to whether the Bureau of Equipment or the Bureau of Construction and Repair shall have jurisdiction of this matter, was all gone through with in the committee; and the judgment of the committee, by a very decided majority, was in favor of sustaining the action of the Secretary of the Navy and putting into our appropriation bill, among the appropriations for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, this provision for the construction and repair of yard craft, etc.

If we strike this out we simply say to the bureau chiefs of the Department that after the Secretary of the Navy, their official head, has settled any matter of this kind, they may then come here and get somebody on the floor of this House to secure the overruling of his action and the upholding of their view. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the influence not only of this one Department but on all the departments of the Government would be very bad indeed if the official heads of those departments are to be overruled in this manner.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have just a word to add. Of course, if the conclusion of a department officer is conclusive upon the committee, that is the end of it. But I do not suppose that there is any special objection to a member of the House rising here and discussing some of the features of this bill and making some inquiries that may disclose the facts behind the proposition when it is proposed to change the record of a department in the line of appropriations as they have been made from the beginning of the Government until now.

I have no doubt that a majority of the committee have reached the other conclusion. I have great respect for the committee; but when a committee of this House duplicates appropriations in this bill and concedes on the floor that they do not know that they have been duplicating them, I do not think they stand in a very strong position to insist upon the support of the House just because the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair has made a certain recommendation and the Secretary of the Navy has formally approved that recommendation.

There is not the least doubt that this bill duplicates this power and authority. It still rests with the Bureau of Equipment by the language of the law under the decision of the Judge-Advocate-General; and the committee proposes, at the suggestion of Admiral Bowles and with the assistance of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], to duplicate this same power in the Bureau of Construction and Repair. I do not know but that this may tend to eliminate some friction and may save some expense, trouble, and controversy; but it will not settle anything and does not consolidate anything. The better way is to leave this matter exactly as it stands until (if I may make this suggestion) the committee shall be more thoroughly advised as to the situation and shall so draw their appropriation bills as not to confer the same authority on two different bureaus. Therefore, I insist on my amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not think there is any trouble about the controversy as to who shall build these. I do not think that is the important objection to this provision. The important objection to it, as I understand it, is that this broad and general authorization will enable this Bureau, if it sees fit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, to build $8,000,000 worth of tugs. I know very well the Department would not do that, but at the same time the committee ought to understand that these lighters and yard craft have always been authorized heretofore by specific words by Congress, and I want to call attention to the fact that in one or two of the prior appropriation bills lighters have been estimated for and asked for by the Department for the different yards.

I remember one at League Island, if I am not mistaken, one at Mare Island, and at other yards. They have been asked for and the committee upon examination has concluded that they could do without them and have stricken them out of the former appropriation bills. Now, this item in its language gives them general power to construct as many of these or as few of these as they want to without any specific or particular authorization from Congress. That language is too broad. It gives too great a power. It seems to me the Congress itself ought to fix and determine how many of these lighters shall be built and how many of these tugs shall be built, and not authorize the Department to go on and build as many as they wish.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not a fact that this work will be done in the Government navy-yards?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, no; it will be done wherever they want it done. They can authorize it by contract or in any other way—they can buy them.

Mr. FINLEY. The Department would be authorized to have the work done there, would it not?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not understand that any vessel is authorized to be constructed at the navy-yard now.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, under this clause.

Mr. DAYTON. Under this clause, yes, or by the law as it now stands. My understanding is that these vessels that will cost $70,000 apiece, as many of them as they want under this provision, can be constructed or bought or contracted for. Now, I make the objection to the provision that that is too broad a power.

Mr. FOSS. Now, may I ask my friend a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman know that whenever any of these bureaus has asked for a tug costing any considerable amount of money, as, for instance, $70,000 here in this bill, that we have always made a specific appropriation for it?

Mr. DAYTON. That is just what I am insisting on.

Mr. FOSS. And while the language may be broad enough to cover, as we say, yard craft here, construction and repair of tugs, and things of that sort, will not the gentleman in all fairness state that that applies only to very small craft, very small boats, that cost an inconsiderable amount of money, but which are necessary to our navy-yards?

Mr. DAYTON. Why, I will say to the chairman, in all frankness, that the language is so broad and general that I am in doubt what it will include, and that that is the objection I am urging. There is no question in the world but that under it you can build the lighters that we turned down in our Navy bill one year ago, and which we decided the yards could do without. There is no doubt but what under this particular language we can build anything in the shape of yard craft or anything in the shape of barges, and that the fund of $8,000,000 can be devoted to it. The very reason we have always specifically appropriated for these items is the very reason why I think the language is dangerous. You might as well say that for the construction and repair of vessels, of battle ships, of cruisers, that this money shall be turned over. That is the objection I have to it, and I confess very frankly the more I study it the more I come to the conclusion that that ought to go out. I would not have raised this point. I was opposed to it in the committee, but I expected to abide by the decision of the committee. However, since it has been raised, in all fairness, I wanted to state the situation.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the provision as placed here in this bill has come at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, in line with the decision which he has rendered as to certain work to be done between two different bureaus of the Department. The Secretary of the Navy has decided that the construction and repair of yard craft and other vessels should be under the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

The Bureau of Equipment has insisted that it should have jurisdiction of this work. Now, the Secretary of the Navy has pointed out, in his opinion, the reason why. He says substantially this: If the Bureau of Equipment wishes a barge or a tug, it ought to go to the Bureau of Construction and get it; otherwise, under the Bureau of Equipment you will have a miniature bureau of construction and repair grow up.

If the Bureau of Ordnance wants a tug it must go to the Bureau of Construction and Repair and get it. Otherwise the Bureau of Ordnance will have a little machine shop and a construction plant for building its own tugs. If the Bureau of Yards and Docks wants a tug or a boat it must go to the proper Bureau of Construction and Repair and get that boat. Otherwise the Bureau of Yards and Docks will have a machinery plant and a construction plant of its own, and instead of but one Bureau of Construction and Repair every bureau will have these little shops for the building of boats.

Now, along the line of economy, along the line of the consolidation of bureaus for which I stand here, I say, that, in my judgment, the Secretary of the Navy ought to be sustained here. If he is not sustained, then every chief of bureau will come here to Congress——

Mr. TATE. Is not this just an effort for a new trial, when this question has been settled by the Secretary?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. TATE. And will not the new Secretary have to go over it again, and will not the question come up here again, and why not settle it now?

Mr. FOSS. We hold the Secretary of the Navy responsible for the efficient discharge of his duties and for the efficient administration of the Navy Department. Now, these questions of jurisdiction between these different bureaus come before him from them. If you are going to decide in favor of the chief of a bureau as against the Secretary of the Navy, why have any Secretary of the Navy at all? If you hold him responsible for the efficient discharge of the administration of the Navy Department, why should you go back on him? Better have no Cabinet officer whatever.

Mr. DAYTON and Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire more time?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAYTON. I have nothing to say about the question of the Secretary's decision between the bureaus. That was determined in the committee to my satisfaction; but what I wanted to ask the gentleman is if he will not consent to striking out the words "construction and," so as to leave this repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges for use at home stations, so as not to authorize this Bureau in this general way to build a hundred lighters or barges, if they want to, without Congress passing upon each one to see whether it is proper.

Mr. FOSS. Let me ask my friend a question. If we leave out the words "construction and," what bureau then would have charge?

Mr. DAYTON. Why, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, of course, because it is under that Bureau. I simply want to prevent the unlimited power of building these vessels.

Mr. FOSS. I know, but my friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] will come along and say that in the opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General the Bureau of Equipment already has the power to construct these barges.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is not that correct? Has he not given such an opinion? I am not responsible for the opinion. I only call attention to it.

Mr. FOSS. You rely upon that opinion. So if that opinion be good law, the Bureau of Equipment will have charge of the construction of these vessels and the Bureau of Construction and Repair will have the repair of these vessels, so we will divide these little craft up between the two bureaus. And therefore we will increase the friction which has already obtained between the two.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does not the gentleman concede that the Judge-Advocate-General has so held?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know whether the Judge-Advocate-General has so held. I do not concede it. He may have so held, but whether the opinion is good law or not is another question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but it governs the Department in the construction of the bill, and you have the same language now that they had then.

Mr. FOSS. The Comptroller might not have the same opinion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But we have the same Judge-Advocate-General now, and we have the same language now, that we had then.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the informal amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAYTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "construction and," so that if any of these vessels are to be authorized it must be by act of Congress, under specific appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, civil establishment, Bureau of Construction and Repair, $25,824.25; and no other fund appropriated by this act shall be used in payment for such service.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 23 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 23. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 10, page 23, the following:

"Naval Station, Port Royal, S. C.: For 1 clerk, $1,200; 1 rodman and inspector, $3 per diem; 1 messenger and janitor, $1.50 per diem; 1 master of tugs, $1,200; 1 mail messenger, including Sundays, $2 per diem; 1 telegraph operator, including Sundays, $3 per diem; one electrician, $1,200; in all, $6,546.50."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. I would like the gentleman to make some explanation in regard to this.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I was absent on account of a duty imposed on me by the House when this part of the bill was reached, and hence I asked to return to it. It is well known that it was provided two years ago that the station at Port Royal should be transferred to Charleston, and appropriations have been made for the Charleston station. But no work has been done at Charleston, and the naval establishment at Port Royal remains in the same condition as heretofore. In the naval appropriation act of last year a small appropriation was made for each one of the bureaus, including the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and the same appropriations have been inserted in the bill for this year, except that for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which I have just sent to the desk. The reason for that was that the Department was very anxious that the naval station at Port Royal should be converted into a training station.

The Secretary of the Navy so recommended to the committee, but the committee have not favored that action, and there is no provision in the bill for carrying it into effect. Now, as it was understood by the Chief of Yards and Docks that it was to be turned over to the Bureau of Navigation instead of being left with the Bureau of Yards and Docks, no appropriation was asked by him for yards and docks. Therefore I make this motion to have these items inserted in the bill, the same as were provided by the appropriation act of last year, and I hope the chairman of the committee will make no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I understand the gentleman had a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks in reference to this matter, recommending that these men be kept there for another year in view of the fact that the Charleston Navy-Yard was not ready for work and that it was necessary to keep that yard open in order to do a little work in connection with the Navy. Now, I understand he has a letter to that effect.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I have the letter.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to have that letter go into the RECORD as an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will place it in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to it if there is anything to do, and while I would go a long way to see the gentleman from South Carolina accommodated, if it be merely to make a donation of $6,000 to people that have nothing to do down there, namely, as a place that is not used, and that probably it would be better to "Martinique" it if the Lord would send the volcano—I mean so far as this station is concerned—speaking respectfully, then I would not have so much sympathy with it. In other words, I had occasion to say yesterday it was very easy to establish an office and it was like pulling eye teeth to get rid of it. I would like to know if there is any possible use for these gentlemen down there being continued at an expense of $6,000. If so, well. Is it not a fact that there is public property down there that a watchman at $720 would be able to care for as well or better?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentleman that there is necessity for this appropriation. That station is now one of the torpedo stations, and there are six or seven of them there, and that pertains to the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Here is the letter from the chief of the Bureau. He says he will not need this appropriation if the station is to be converted into a training station and transferred to the Bureau of Navigation. But as it is not transferred by this bill, it is necessary that these salaries should be provided for the coming year, as they were for the present year. A good deal of work is done there at very little expense. Only three or four clerks are provided for—one for each of the other bureaus—and it is to provide for this omission as to this Bureau that this amendment is proposed. I now send up the letter, if the gentleman desires to have it read.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 14, 1902.

MY DEAR MR. ELLIOTT: Replying to your inquiry of this morning I would say that if the Port Royal Naval Station is to be continued as a station for the general work of the Navy a civil establishment, under Yards and Docks, would be needed, upon the same basis as that for the current year, namely:

One clerk	$1,200.00
One rodman and inspector, per diem	3.00
One messenger and janitor, per diem	1.50
One master of tugs	1,200.00
One mail messenger, including Sundays, per diem	2.00
One telegraph operator, including Sundays, per diem	2.00
One electrician	1,200.00

If it be continued as a training station, this Bureau would have no duties in connection with it, and any force needed would be paid from the funds of the Bureau of Navigation.

Yours, very truly,

MORDECAI T. ENDICOTT.

Hon. WILLIAM ELLIOTT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CANNON. The trouble, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina, is that the letter commences with an "if"—"if the Department" were to hold that is to be continued. So that the word "if" is fixed to it, and anyway I never put such stress upon a bureau officer's letter unless it is awfully specific. There are some times they go as far as they may, and then they get it up to the Secretary. Can not these gentlemen break into the civil service somewhere else? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. This is the only point I propose to bring it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For incidental expenses for Navy vessels, yards, and the Bureau, such as foreign postage, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, stationery, office furnishings, and instruments, $15,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order in lines 7 and 8, on the words "and the Bureau." This makes a contingent fund in the naval bill for a bureau of the Department. I am willing that it should go out by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "and the Bureau." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

In all, steam machinery, $3,405,000.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add on page 55, after line 12, as follows: "Test of liquid fluid for naval purposes. For extended tests of liquid fuel from the California and Texas oil fields, under the direction of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $20,000.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter dated February 4, from the Secretary of the Navy, in which appropriation is recommended; also a letter from Admiral Melville, in which he urgently requests the making of the appropriation. I understand that the amendment will be acceptable to the members of the committee.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Steam Engineering: For contingencies, drawing materials, and instruments for the drafting room, $1,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on lines 13, 14, and 15. That does not belong in this bill. It creates a contingent fund for a bureau of the Department, and is not for the general naval service.

Mr. FOSS. This appropriation has been in the bill year after year for a great many years.

Mr. CANNON. If so, it was overlooked. In other words, there is a general contingent fund under the rules of the House carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, as follows: "For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawing material, horse and wagon used for official purposes, freight, expressage, postage, and other absolutely necessary expenses for the Navy Department, its various bureaus and officers, $12,000."

Mr. FOSS. Does that take in other bureaus in other departments?

Mr. CANNON. In the Navy Department.

Mr. FOSS. In other departments besides the Navy?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. Every department has its contingent fund.

Mr. DAYTON. Would it include the drawing materials and drawing instruments for the drafting room?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly. This is a mere duplicate appropriation, and under the rules of the House it is not in order on this bill, because it is provided for already in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. There is no doubt about it. It is precisely these matters that have gone out by unanimous consent elsewhere through the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. There may be a good reason why it ought not to be inserted, but it is not clear what the point of order is.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that it is not in order on the naval bill, but should be on the legislative bill, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order, unless the chairman of the committee can point out some special reason why it should not be sustained.

Mr. FOSS. All I can state is that this has been the law year after year.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, it has been appropriated for on each annual appropriation bill?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not make it law. It seems very clear to the Chair that this item should be in the legislative bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Toward the construction of a building, on land owned by the Government, at Annapolis, for an experiment station and testing laboratory in the Department of Marine Engineering and Naval Construction (at a cost not to exceed $250,000), and the complete equipment of the same with all the necessary appliances and apparatus (at a cost not to exceed $150,000), $200,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to make a point of order in the first instance in this matter. There is nothing that authorizes the construction of this building.

Mr. FOSS. No.

Mr. CANNON. There is no legislation that authorizes it. It is an independent building, as I understand it. Of course, if it should be in order, I would offer an amendment that it should be included in the $8,000,000, the cost of the plant.

Mr. MUDD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MUDD. Do I understand the gentleman to make the point of order on this paragraph? I am frank to say to the gentleman in that connection that it is understood by the committee that this is not a necessary part of the Naval Academy.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know as to that. I will ask, reserving the point of order, whether it is a necessary part of the Naval Academy. I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. MUDD. My judgment is that it is not in any essential sense a part of the Naval Academy. Further on, if it should be considered a part of the Naval Academy, the Secretary would have authority under the authorization of the act of 1890 to build it without further legislation. I have before me the language of the act of June 7, 1900, containing this provision:

Provided, That before any part of this sum is expended complete plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy and for each and every purpose connected therewith, which plans shall involve a total expenditure of not more than $8,000,000, including the sum of $1,220,000 heretofore appropriated and the sum herein appropriated for said buildings and improvements and for all additional land needed and required to carry out the aforesaid plans.

In other words, before the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to spend a cent of that money, it is made his duty by the mandate of the provision I have read to have prepared under his approval complete plans covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements necessary for the Academy.

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to know from the gentleman in charge of the bill whether or not this is fairly a part of the plan for the Naval Academy. If it is, I do not want to make a point of order on it, but will offer an amendment that it shall be embraced in the $8,000,000.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my colleague [Mr. CANNON] that my views on this matter differ somewhat from some members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOSS. I was saying, inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois has called upon me to speak out frankly in reference to this question, that my view of the matter does not correspond exactly with that of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD]. This is an engineering laboratory, and an experimental station; and at the same time it is a building in which perhaps there will be some course of instruction—a postgraduate course of instruction possibly.

It will have to do, I think, with the education of naval officers; and when it came to the question in committee as to whether this appropriation ought to be included within the limit of the $8,000,000 fixed by Congress for the rebuilding of the Naval Academy, I felt myself in duty and in conscience bound to insist that the provision, if it were to become a law, should be within the $8,000,000 limitation. But the committee, in its larger wisdom, decided otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee [Mr. FOSS], and also that of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], the Chair is very clear in the opinion that the provision is not in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, Naval Academy, $229,905.77.

Mr. MUDD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no part of the money appropriated in this paragraph or elsewhere in this bill, or to be hereafter appropriated, shall be expended in the purchase of any history of the Spanish-American war written by Edgar Stanton Maclay, for use at the Naval Academy, in ships' libraries, or in any other part of the naval establishment of the United States.

Mr. DAYTON. I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia, as the Chair understands, reserves a point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. MUDD. Do I understand that the gentleman makes a point of order or reserves it?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, I make the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. Well, that is the best way, perhaps. I will not contend that the amendment in the form in which it is offered is not subject to a point of order, because it includes words which make it apply to future appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MUDD. I am ready for the Chair to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is clearly obnoxious to the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment in another form, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 62, after line 14, add as follows: "Provided, however, That no part of the money appropriated in this paragraph, or elsewhere in this bill, shall be expended in the purchase of any history of the Spanish-American war written by Edgar Stanton Maclay, for use at the Naval Academy, in ships' libraries, or in any other part of the naval establishment of the United States.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia also makes the point of order against this amendment.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, on that I desire to be heard briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MUDD. Though I do not think the Chair needs to hear me on that. I apprehend the amendment I have just offered is clearly a limitation in that it only refers to money appropriated in this bill. I could refer to decisions, if it be thought necessary, but I hardly think it is. I have in my hand, however, one reference to which I will call the attention of the Chair. I read from the Manual of the Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, on page 283:

The following provision in the Army appropriation bill, namely, "that hereafter no money appropriated for Army transportation shall be used in payment for the transportation of troops and supplies for the Army," etc.—

was ruled out of order. An amendment was then offered similar to the above, with the modification of eliminating reference to future appropriations, and was declared not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is perfectly clear to the Chair that the amendment is a limitation and not legislation, and that the amendment is in order. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I make this suggestion. This has no relation to the paragraph to which it is an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is germane to the bill.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment of which I gave notice and for which, though briefly, I think I sufficiently stated my reasons a day or two ago. I have no desire to enter into a detailed discussion of the amendment at this time. In fact, I had hoped there would be no opposition to it. I understand that all the gentlemen of the committee say they agree that this book should not be permitted to be used in the Naval Academy, or any other portion of the Navy, but their contention is—and I want to state it fairly, and I think I do—that there is no explanation of its being so used.

Upon that I want to make this statement: That there are now in use 2 volumes of Maclay's History in the Naval Academy. Gentlemen can not with reason argue, as some of them seem to intimate, that it would be just as appropriate to name any other obnoxious publication and say this money should not be used for purchasing that, because other obnoxious publications have no similar relationship to the Naval Academy. Maclay's History of the Navy has been formally adopted, and is this day, if there be classes going on there, in use as a text-book of the Naval Academy of this country. I read now from an interview in the Washington Post of July 20, 1901, quoting what Secretary Long then said in reference to this book and its author:

It will be a sufficient rebuke to Mr. Maclay to learn that his book in its present shape has been barred from the Naval Academy.

That is my contention, that the work of Maclay as a whole had been adopted up to the publication of the original third volume, which no man in this country wants to justify, and I admit there is no danger of the adoption of that original edition.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Did not the gentleman hear me read a letter here yesterday?

Mr. MUDD. I did not.

Mr. FOSS. From the Bureau of Navigation to the effect that this volume had never been used in the Naval Academy?

Mr. MUDD. I did not hear that, but I will refer to that.

Mr. FOSS. It is in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. MUDD. I understand, and I have read it. I say the Secretary of the Navy, when this third volume came out, in his own language barred "it in its present shape," and as bearing upon that, also, I will read a telegram which I have just received from a prominent editorial writer, Mr. Merrill A. Teague, of the Baltimore American. He says:

Regarding Wainwright's letter about Maclay's book not being in use at Annapolis: After it was written Secretary Long told me in an interview that it really did not change the situation; that Maclay's history having been adopted and two volumes installed, any subsequent volumes would take their place automatically unless a special order should be issued barring the whole or any part. Hence Long issued the order barring volume 3 in its original form.

Now, the gentleman can not say, I apprehend, that there has been any order issued as to the revised edition. I do not so understand. It has just been published, but if that book has been barred since notice of this amendment has been given, and I apprehend if it has been done it was done in pursuance of that, and because the influences in charge of the Bureau of Navigation do not want to encounter the test of a vote of the House. That should not prevent this Congress, if it thinks the matter of sufficient importance, as I think it is, from expressing its legislative will as to the use of a book of this character in an institution for which we are now appropriating money, a book which brought so much in the way of bitterness of controversy and hurtful effects upon the Navy through that court of inquiry, of which we all know.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MUDD. If I may have the time; certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. Is it true that in an interview, as stated in the public prints, the President of the United States himself has assured you that this book shall not be used in the Naval Academy during his term of office, or not?

Mr. MUDD. Well, now, I do not know——

Mr. DAYTON. And if he has, can you not have confidence in him without loading this on this appropriation bill?

Mr. MUDD. Yes; I have great confidence in Theodore Roosevelt. I believe that he respects brave men, and that he has respect for the opinions of those who differ from him. I do not know that I ought to answer the gentleman's question categorically, but since it has been put here, if those who are opposed to this amendment are willing to have the facts made public, I am, and I will say that the President of the United States did say to me that this work should never be used in the Naval Academy as long as he should be President of the United States. [Applause.] I respect him for that. I do not know, however, that the President is familiar with the revised edition and the extent to which it has been made to conform to the findings of the court of inquiry. If the gentleman had asked me to further state the conversation between the President and myself I might, perhaps, have given him information that might have weakened the strength of his inclination to make opposition to this amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. There is no opposition. It is just a question of propriety and necessity. If the President has promised you that during his term of office, which extends beyond this fiscal year, this book shall not be used, what is the necessity for putting it in this bill?

Mr. MUDD. I want a legislative expression of disapproval of the contents of this book, the revised as well as the unrevised editions. Presidents and heads of bureaus and departments will have respect for that. Other Presidents have died before the expiration of their term, and the present Executive may not be vouchsafed to us until the end of his. I trust that he will. He is in pretty vigorous health now, and I apprehend that he will live out the rest of his term and be ready and willing to take another. [Applause.]

I do not feel at liberty to say just what further the President of the United States said to me about this, but I will say this much, that I told him as forcibly as I could that if there was one thing upon which he and I could not agree it was his position on this Schley question, and I told him that I intended to offer this precise amendment when this bill was under consideration. Further than that I do not think I ought to say just now. Had the President asked me not to offer it, I would have respected his request, but declined to comply with it. The gentleman may infer that support of this measure carries no risk of Presidential displeasure, if that has any terrors for anybody.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Give it all to us.

Mr. MUDD. No, I will not say anything more. I am not the spokesman of the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I should like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may use the comparison in a respectful sense, I apprehend that almost any thief caught around any man's hen roost, having stolen two chickens and being accused of an attempt to steal a third, would say that he did not intend to do it. I do not want to express any disrespect toward these gentlemen in the Navy Department by the use of that somewhat homely illustration. It has some touch of illustration, however.

Of course, these gentlemen will say now that they do not expect to use this book; but the Secretary of the Navy evidently expected to use it, should the objectionable language be stricken out, when he said in the very language of his interview—and he used substantially, if I recollect aright, the same expression to me in a private interview—that the book would be barred "in its present shape."

I do not want now to go into this controversy between Schley and Sampson. We all know, however, who is at the head of the Bureau of Navigation at this time, Admiral Henry C. Taylor, who was in command of a battle ship that unfortunately did not have much to do with the actual work of the naval engagement at Santiago. I remember one thing in that gentleman's testimony before the court of inquiry in which he stated—and I have the reference to the page of the record—in speaking about that much-discussed famous loop of Schley, Admiral Taylor stated under oath that the Brooklyn went away a mile and a half from the line of column. It will be found on page 722 of the record of the court of inquiry, and his testimony was that the Brooklyn went "a mile and a half to seaward of our column of battle."

You will see the pertinency of this statement in a moment. In an official document, on page 5 or 6 of what is known as "Executive Document C," the Secretary of the Navy calls attention to the fact that a board composed of Admiral Taylor, Admiral Evans, and others, had certified over their signatures that the Brooklyn in her loop only went away the length of her tactical diameter. I invite attention to this contrast in testimony for this reason:

If there is at the head of the Bureau of Navigation now, having control of the text-books at the Naval Academy, a gentleman who once stated before the court of inquiry, in a manifest effort to show that Schley was guilty of irresolution, if not of cowardice, that he went about 3,000 yards away from the conflict, and that gentleman had formerly stated in an official document before the animus of subsequent controversy had begun its work, that he only went away between six and eight hundred yards, I am not going to trust the selection of histories relating to the conflict at Santiago to that head of the Bureau of Navigation if I can help it. [Applause.]

That gentleman also stated in an official report, in speaking of his part in the battle of Santiago, that a shell from one of his 13-inch guns was seen to enter the Maria Teresa. I assume that he thought that. It was natural perhaps that he should seek to make people believe that he had taken some appreciable part in that fight, and yet in the report of the board appointed by Admiral Sampson to plot the injuries received through the impact of the projectiles upon the sides of the Spanish vessels, not one 13-inch shell was shown to have struck the Maria Teresa. A man who accomplished almost nothing is liable to feel too great a degree of friendliness to a historian who minimizes the performances of the man who accomplished almost all.

I say these gentlemen who are interested—I will not say in the distortion of history, but in making history appear in the best light for themselves and in the worst light for Schley—are not the men to trust with the question as to whether a history shall be sanctioned which, in a measure, originated a scandal in the Navy of this country. If these gentlemen of the majority side of the Naval Committee are so willing, as they say, to approve the reported judgment of the President of the United States and others that this book should stay out of the Naval Academy, they have ample opportunity to express that view by voting in favor of this amendment.

Now is the time and now the opportunity to manifest their disapproval of the work.

Let those who are in accord with the opinions of this historian—and I have particular reference now to the revised edition of his work, in which he adopts in large measure the findings of the court of inquiry—let them vote against this amendment. Those who disapprove of that producton and wish, as Ido, in this signal manner to repudiate it will voice the courage of their convictions and in sustaining the proposition of the amendment vote to strike slander out of favor and do a slight measure of justice to the most distinguished hero, in my judgment, of the American Navy in the Spanish-American war. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the House of Representatives by any protracted discussion of the merits of the amendment offered by my colleague from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], nor by any kind of animadversions upon anybody, either officer of the Navy or any civil officer of the Government of the United States, over the controversy which has unfortunately arisen, but I do desire to rise in my place in this House, as a member of the Congressional delegation from Maryland, and to register my unqualified, unhesitating confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and courage of Admiral Winfield S. Schley. [Loud applause.] The Maryland delegation, sir, and every member of it, however humble, would be false to his own duty, false to his own conscientious conviction of right, and false to the honorable and distinguished records of the soldiers and sailors of the State of Maryland in every war in which this country has been engaged if he should sit silent in this body and permit the slanders which have been heaped upon this brave sailor to be continued and made permanent and perpetuated by history—no; by fiction, sir; written by one who has not yet won his literary spurs in the line of historical writings.

Mr. Chairman, if this history be inaccurate, if the statements of alleged or supposed facts contained in this alleged historical work do not comport with the real facts, then not only, sir, should the President of the United States, as I am proud to hear that he has, make a public statement or a statement which has since been made public, that this work should not be used in the training of young men for the Navy, but the time has come when the House of Representatives, the legislative department of this Government, should add its sanction to this statement by distinctly saying by legislation embodied in this statement that this book is not history and shall not be used as such. It is the purpose of the United States Government in training these sailors, in educating the men who will lead the jack tars, the men behind the guns, in future wars of righteousness and for the elevation of the rights of mankind, to hold up to the minds and consciences of these young men the brave and worthy deeds of their forebears.

Admiral Schley has borne with patience, aye, with patriotic patience and courage, with the patience of a martyr and the courage of a brave soldier, every animadversion heaped upon him, and the welkin of approval will ring throughout this country when it goes out to the men and women of this land that the Congress of these United States at this late date has done simple justice to Admiral Schley, the hero of Santiago. [Loud applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, this matter is treated lightly—perhaps it has been treated too lightly—but the people of the United States have registered their verdict upon this question, and it is a very different verdict from that which some gentlemen anticipated. If there had been nothing but that bullet-scarred cruiser Brooklyn to show who won that fight, the scars in the hull of that gallant boat would attest to fair-minded men forever not only that the Brooklyn was in the front during every moment of that fight, but would be evidence that Winfield Scott Schley, the distinguished son of Maryland, and the Brooklyn had made and won that fight. [Loud applause.]

The President has dismissed Maclay, who wrote this book, from the employ of the Government. The Secretary of the Navy has disproved the use of his book. Let Congress, voicing the unanimous will of the people, confirm and indorse their righteous acts by the passage of this amendment.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I had thought the so-called Schley controversy was dead [laughter on the Democratic side], and that Maclay's book had been suppressed by order of the Secretary of the Navy; and as my friend says, by order of the President of the United States. And Maclay himself had been suppressed. Why drag him out of oblivion to mar the peace and contentment of this hour? I supposed that we had heard the last of this controversy. It ought to have been closed when the court of inquiry passed upon the case; it ought to have been closed when the Secretary of the Navy passed upon the appeal; it ought to have been closed when the President of the United States passed upon the appeal which was made to him.

But, as I say, it has been dragged in here to mar the unanimity of expression upon the naval appropriation bill. Why do it? It does not answer any purpose. I have nothing against Admiral Schley. I am glad that he was in the battle of Santiago. I am glad that Clark, who brought the Oregon around the Horn, was there.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. FOSS. I am glad also that Richard Wainwright was there, who never felt himself too near the enemy. I am glad also that Evans was there. I am glad that Philip was there, who gave the glory not to Sampson nor to Schley, but to Almighty God. I am glad that the other captains of our battle ships and cruisers were there, and I am glad, more than all, that behind them stood the men, unnamed and unsung, before whom have been spread no feasts and who have not been the recipients of any silver-service sets. I am glad that they were there. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PEARRE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSS. I regret exceedingly that I can not.

Mr. PEARRE. You will remember that Admiral Schley said that it was the men behind the guns who deserved the credit. He did not detract from the credit of the sailor.

Mr. FOSS. I have not attempted to detract from the credit of Admiral Schley.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why did you insinuate that one man never felt himself too near the guns?

Mr. FOSS. I did not say too near the guns. I said who never felt that he was too near the enemy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman mean to say that he did not mean to reflect upon Schley when he said that? Did he not have in his mind the purpose of leaving an impression upon the House that Schley had felt he was too near the enemy?

Mr. FOSS. I said nothing about Admiral Schley. It is the business of the naval officer to get into close proximity with the enemy, and the President, so far as Schley is concerned, in his comment on these matters, said:

> Had the Brooklyn turned to the westward in the same direction the Spanish ships were going instead of in the contrary direction, it would undoubtedly have been in more dangerous proximity to them, but it would have been more dangerous for them as well as for her. But this question of danger must not be too nicely weighed by those whose trade it is to dare greatly for the honor of the flag.

Now, my friends, we have made a mistake. The American people sometimes make mistakes. I think—and I speak for myself—that we are too often apt in this country to try to associate the name of one man or two men with every great event and give to them all the honor and the glory. That has been the trouble. We have tried to give the honor and the credit to one or two men in the Santiago campaign, but the honor and glory is for all. I care not whether these words come from the lips of Schley or whether he received them from the lips of McCalla. There is glory enough for each and for all.

I had hoped that this controversy was over. I had hoped when that great admiral whose light went out in the shock at Santiago, who has been dragging his weary frame down in the valley of the shadow of death until God called him home the other day to receive the reward which press and people had denied him here—I had hoped that the controversy would then be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say to my friends here that I have never been in this controversy for Admiral Sampson, nor have I been for Admiral Schley; but I have been for the American Navy, which was greater than any one man, or any two men, or any clique of men in it.

When you attempt to prolong the controversy or give it life, you only do injury and harm to the American Navy. The American Navy is an institution that will live long after you and I are gone. It will live long after the Sampsons and Schleys are gone. It will live in the future and be the defender of our honor and our flag upon the seas. By prolonging this controversy, which you and I can not settle, we only do harm and injury to the great arm of our Government's defense. Every man who was in that fight I trust some day will have his due credit. It is not for our human nature, weak as it is; it is not for our human vision, weak as it is; it is not for our human judgment, weak as it is, to give proper meed of praise to each and all.

But when the smoke of battle shall have died away; when the last tramp, tramp, tramp of the returning heroes shall have been forgotten, yes, fifty or one hundred years hence, in the clear white light of impartial truth, when the recording angel of history comes to write the names of those who wrought mightily for their country and their country's cause, she will write the names of all who took part in that great naval conflict, whether in humble sphere or in exalted station, those who were away down below in the bowels of the vessel shoveling coal at a temperature of 200°, and those, as well, who trod the quarter-deck, and give to each and all their just and worthy honors. Unto all should be given the glory and the victory of Santiago's great fight. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the carefully prepared and carefully enunciated utterances of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] and especially to his tribute to the muse of history who is to "write the names of all those who took part in the battle of Santiago." But the trouble with which we are now confronted is that the muse of history has been writing the names of those who did not take part in the battle of Santiago [laughter], and the muse of history has been trying with exceeding great labor to leave out as well as may be the names of those who did take part in that great battle. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman think the muse of history has started in to write at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, the little naval muse has started in to write. [Laughter.] The little Bureau of Navigation muse is said to have been inspired to read the proof and the little Committee on Naval Affairs muse has been squinting at it all to a large extent. [Laughter.]

Now, it is not much of a muse, Mr. Chairman, but it is a so-called muse, don't you know, and don't you see? And by the way, while I am getting English, and quite English, don't you know, I want to apologize for the mispronunciation of the name of the chief gun behind the muse, formerly in the Bureau of Navigation.

I learned yesterday, or rather I have learned since yesterday, that I have been guilty of mispronouncing the proper name of an improper person. [Laughter.] I learn that since he has been appointed in command of a ship to attend the coronation ceremonies of the King of England Captain Crowninshield, in analogy with the pronunciation of Cholmondely, which in Great Britain is "Chumley," and of Peabody, which is there "Pebudy," has become Admiral "Crunchell," don't you know? [Laughter.] No worse faux pas than that could have happened to me.

The gentleman from Illinois says that this controversy ought to be "suppressed." He tells us that this matter ought to have been "closed" at one stage, and then it "ought to have been closed" at another stage, and then it "ought to have been closed" at a third stage; that Maclay has been "suppressed" as well as his book. When was he suppressed? By whom was he suppressed? When ought this controversy to close? When ought the controversy itself to be suppressed?

I will tell you when. When every one of the miserable scoundrels (if there are any) in the Navy Department, who read and indorsed those "proofs" of this book and encouraged this fellow to write himself down a liar, while he called Schley a liar, and to write himself down "ass" and "coward," while he wrote Schley down a coward, has been discovered and investigated and punished, and when the American people know who they are. [Applause.] I do not know whether there are any of them or not.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. It is easy enough to make statements. It is easy enough to make allegations and charges.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am making none. Maclay made them.

Mr. FOSS. You are stating, if I understand you aright, that the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation revised this work.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am stating that Maclay said he looked over it; that is all. I want to know whether that is true or not?

Mr. FOSS. You do not know whether it is true or not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not; but I want to know.

Mr. FOSS. If you do not know whether it is true or not, why do you make the allegation?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have not said that it was true. I merely say that Maclay said it was true. Now, Mr. Chairman, I state that this man Maclay——

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment? I simply want to say that on one occasion, in the presence of the Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Crowninshield absolutely denied that he ever saw or revised the proofs of that history.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why has he not said so publicly?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not know why.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should like to know why.

Mr. DAYTON. I will simply say this. After the order of the Secretary of the Navy was published prohibiting any naval officer from saying anything, I think he obeyed it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah, but there was a long time previous to the issuance of that order when he might, like Admiral Sampson, have denied that he had anything to do with it. And during all that time he did not deny it.

Now, a word about Admiral Sampson. Pronouncing the Latin according to the English analogy, I will say, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." I do not know any "bonum" to say; I will rest content, therefore, in saying "nil."

Admiral Sampson denied that he had anything to do with indorsing these proofs or revising them. He acted the part of a gentleman and an officer when he made that denial. I would like to know why it is confined to the secret arcana of the Navy Department, this denial of Mr. Crowninshield or Captain Crowninshield or Admiral "Crunchell?" Why is it that he has never asked for a court-martial upon himself when the allegation was made by this man Maclay, so that he might clear his skirts of a charge, which, if true, proves him guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer or a gentleman?

"Ah," says the gentleman from Illinois, "the controversy ought to have 'closed,' everything has been 'suppressed.'" I will tell the gentleman a little bit of a secret.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will tell the gentleman a little secret. We have been lately marching on rapidly toward the suppression of the freedom of the press and the suppression of freedom of speech in some parts of our country under the flag. But in the American continental part of the country we have not yet reached a point where a ukase from the White House or a pronunciamento from the Naval Committee of the House can suppress discussion amongst the American people or suppress free thought when the people believe that an officer—a gentleman, a brave man, a true man—has been abused and wrongfully treated.

And just as long as they think so they are going to discuss it, and the so-called "Schley controversy" will remain not only a "so-called," but a real Schley controversy, and the American people are going to have their share in discussing it in the press and on this floor and everywhere else.

Mr. Chairman, it is a shame and a disgrace to a great country that a man who was a leader among a great historical body of leaders—a captain, a sea hero, long before the Spanish war—who earned his reputation in the war between the States and afterwards earned it upon the Greely expedition, should have been written down by a naval employee, and, as alleged, after consultation with officers in the Navy Department, as a coward and a liar. Those who wrote him down were themselves cowards and liars. What objection has the gentleman to the adoption of this amendment?

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well, then, why should it have been discussed?

Mr. FOSS. No objection whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why should it have been discussed?

Mr. FOSS. It has not been discussed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then why did it not just go through without opposition?

Mr. FOSS. As far as I am concerned it can go through.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why was the point of order made?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; why was the point of order made?

Mr. DAYTON. May I answer that?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. Simply because it seemed to me that an appropriation bill of any kind or character was not the proper forum for us to determine the kind of books that should be used or for us to determine the reputation of anybody, and because it was useless and unnecessary legislation. I made the point of order without in the slightest extent intending to defend Maclay or his history, but simply because I think it is unnecessary legislation upon this appropriation bill, because of the fact that the book never has been used in the Academy, and by the direction of the President of the United States is not to be used in the Academy; and needless legislation is useless legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I heard the gentleman's explanation; and this, forsooth, is not the proper forum. This—the American House of Representatives, the representatives of the American people, greater than the American Navy and the guardian of the honor of the American Navy—is not the proper forum for the discussion of that question.

Mr. DAYTON. I did not say this was not the proper forum. I said this was not a proper place, on this appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Chairman, then where would we find a proper place? The trouble seems to be that it is tabooed as an "improper subject," and therefore we can not get it before the House at any so-called "proper" place at any time. This is the nearest proper place.

Mr. PEARRE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. PEARRE. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the Committee on Naval Affairs has ever considered or recorded any of the numerous resolutions or bills which have been introduced into that committee looking to a settlement of the matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, being nothing but a plain American citizen, I have the information on that subject that every American subject has, and that is that they have not considered or reported a single solitary one. [Applause and laughter.] And I have the information that every fool way down yonder in my country has, to the effect that they do not want to. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that the court of inquiry unanimously recommended that no further action be taken?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, that is true. That is one of those unfortunate things that is absolutely true. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. And is it not true that the President of the United States——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And that is another of those unfortunate things that is absolutely too true.

Mr. FOSS. Asked that there be no further action taken?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; that is too true. And I suppose the President would like to-day to have this matter "suppressed" and "closed," as the gentleman phrased it, as far as he can; but he can not. He is not yet despot in this country. He is not yet an emperor, and his successors are not emperors on the continent of America, though they may be out in the Philippines.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Inasmuch as the President of the United States himself has condemned the book and declared that it shall not be used in the Naval Academy under his Administration, does the gentleman think it probable that he would object to this House likewise condemning it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I do not know. He may, because I hear——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words and I have done. The gentleman talks about this sort of discussion being an "injury to the Navy." That is a part of this endless sing-song that because you indict a citizen of Mississippi for murder, for example, that you are indicting the State of Mississippi and its fair name and its honor, or that because you find a man somewhere who is guilty of some awful crime, and that man belongs to some particular community, that your execration of him is an execration of that community.

You are not injuring the Navy when you are trying to make the Navy walk in the paths of honor and rectitude and gentlemanly conduct and truth and fair dealing between officer and officer and man and man. That is no injury to the Navy. It is a defense of the Navy—a defense of its honor.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of an anecdote that I heard, that I suppose is merely an anecdote; I do not know that it is true; I have my doubts about it; but the story is that one of these little satrap lieutenants was down at the Army and Navy club not long ago, and some one was discussing the Schley matter. It aroused his ire, because the Navy, "you know," have "settled" the Schley matter. They have settled it and "closed" it; so it was a part of his business to stand behind them and to "suppress" it to the utmost of his little ability to do so.

After a while, being driven to the dernier ressort of men of his sort, not being able to argue the question, he took refuge in anger, and he turned around and said, "Well, I will tell you one thing, sir; the American Congress and the American people don't know what they are 'bucking up' against when they go bucking up against the American Navy." [Laughter.] Why, we have a sort of an idea of what we are going up against. We know who has been "deftly pulling the strings" and how they have been pulling them. I myself am rather proud of the landlubber part of the Navy Department as I said yesterday.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the present distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, while a member of the Appropriations Committee, offered an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, when it was under consideration the same as this is, to make Admiral Dewey the Admiral of the Navy and nobody jumped up to raise a point of order against it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I reckon what the gentleman states is absolutely correct, and I have another idea. I know the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] so well that I know he never does anything accidentally. I never heard of his doing anything accidentally. Everything that he does is done with a set purpose and with deliberation.

Mr. FOSS. I want to correct that. The gentleman from West Virginia did not make any point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understood that he did. I can pay a still higher compliment to the deliberation and set purpose of the gentleman from Illinois. He does not do anything accidentally, and he did not make the point of order accidentally.

Mr. FOSS. I have not made any point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Who made it against this provision?

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman from West Virginia made it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have just told you he did, and you said he did not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. No; the gentleman misunderstood his colleague from Tennessee. As I understood, the gentleman referred to the previous time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; I did not, and I did not misunderstand.

Mr. FOSS. The time when the present Secretary of the Navy offered the amendment in reference to Admiral Dewey?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. SIMS. Making Admiral Dewey the Admiral of the Navy.

Mr. FOSS. There was a point of order raised at that time, I think.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; there was not, and everybody did exactly right in not raising it. These little technical rules are rules to be invoked for the protection of the Treasury and the protection of the honor of the country and of the House, and ought not to be invoked when they are unnecessary, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], with his magnificent intellect and deliberate purposes, never invokes them except for a special purpose and because he is opposed to whatever he invokes them against. [Laughter and applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say in reply to my friend from Mississippi that in the seven years that I have been a member of this House I have not engaged in these partisan debates. I have devoted my study to the affairs of the Navy. I differ from him in regard to many things. I think that in many of his statements he has done an injustice to himself in that unwittingly he has been misled as to his information in all these matters; and in this unfortunate controversy, which every friend of the Navy will deplore, it seems to me that the wise policy is for us to wait——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How long?

Mr. CLAYTON. "How long, O Lord, how long?"

Mr. DAYTON. And for us to get the proper information.

I undertake to say this, and I say it without any desire to stir up any controversy, that as yet the testimony taken in this whole controversy has not been published. We have simply authorized it, and it is not yet out of press. As a lawyer, as a man, I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi, with his brilliancy and talent, would not approve of condemning a verdict or consent to reverse as a judge a verdict until he has seen and examined the testimony upon which such verdict was based.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, "the gentleman from Mississippi" is not trying to condemn anybody, but merely trying to get the House to investigate in order to determine whether anybody ought to be condemned or not.

Mr. DAYTON. Time is long, you know, my friend, and all this testimony will come out; all these matters will come before us. And I ask the gentleman, not in any spirit of ill will or strife, if he does not think it is wise for us to wait, as I say, until the testimony has been published and we have had a chance to read it, before we make up our judgment? And I further ask him if it is not also wise for us, before we make charges against men in this manner which are unkind or which may be untrue, is it not always better for us to ascertain whether they are true?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is the very difficulty. I want to ascertain whether they are true or not, and therefore I want the Speaker of the House to appoint a committee to ascertain whether they are true or not. How long shall we have to wait? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAYTON. As a man, do you not think your statement and your animadversions upon Admiral Crowninshield upon the floor of this House, the ridicule and contemptuous terms which you have heaped upon him, would be unjust if, when the record is examined and all the facts disclosed, it shall appear that Admiral Schley's assignment was originally made at the request and the solicitation of Crowninshield, and that he never saw these proofs of Maclay's book, never revised them, but simply received the thanks of Maclay for furnishing the information which he would give any historian——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If that should be the result, if the gentlemen's statement is correct, I would take a great deal more pleasure in apologizing to Admiral Crowninshield upon the floor of this House than I have taken in insisting that the House should investigate the matter. Now, all I want is to find out whether it is true or not.

Mr. DAYTON. I will join you in that——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why has not the committee been appointed?

Mr. DAYTON. But in advance, as a question of principle, and I say this in all kindness, do not try to prejudge your investigation before making it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have made no statement. I have merely repeated Maclay's statement.

Mr. DAYTON. I just simply want to say this. It has been my earnest purpose and desire to do as far as I could all I could to promote the naval establishment. It is a public duty that is put upon me as a member of Congress. I make my mistakes, I make my blunders. I made this point of order because I felt this legislation is utterly useless.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You think this is a blunder?

Mr. DAYTON (continuing). The President of the United States had assured the gentleman from Maryland, as he said, that this book was not to be used during his term of office. The gentleman from Maryland admits that this provision can only apply to this year. The President's term lasts two or three years yet. Now, there is no necessity for it; and it seems to me it is only brought in here for the purpose of precipitating a discussion about a matter that all of us ought to deplore.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCHIRM. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have risen in this House, either in Committee of the Whole or in the session of the House, and I rise not so much as a Marylander, not so much as an American—though I yield to no man in my pride in my State or in my love for my country—as I do as a man who believes in justice between man and man.

This unfortunate controversy was not precipitated by the friends of Admiral Schley, nor did the patient Admiral do one act that gave an opportunity for opening it. I agree that at this time it is not proper to attempt to discuss this question in full, for the amendment offered reduces itself to a simple proposition, and that is, Shall we suppress Maclay's history of the campaign of Santiago or not? I contend that we should, and for these reasons: Mr. Maclay was the instigator of this entire controversy, by trying to besmirch the fair character of one of the bravest officers that ever commanded a ship in the American Navy. He attempted to belittle a great man and to stain his fair name with infamy. He attempted to send down, by his history, a story black with malice and falsehood. He tried to filter into the minds of the prospective officers of our Navy a lie and a falsehood in order to besmirch the fair record of one of their noblest predecessors.

The President himself, by his summary dismissal of Mr. Maclay, put the stamp of his disapproval upon this so-called history; and why the gentlemen of the Committee on Naval Affairs should urge us to acquiesce now and do nothing further I can not understand, unless they share the opinions of the author of these calumnies. Failure to act simply means to continue the controversy indefinitely. Now is the time for the House of Representatives—the representatives of the people—to declare its condemnation of this man who, for his villainy, was discharged from the employ of the Government by the President of the United States. [Loud applause.] We are simply supplementing, if you please, the act of the President. We, as representatives of the people of this country, wish to express our disapproval, not now of Sampson, not now our approval of Schley, so far as the merits of the controversy are concerned, but to express our pronounced disapproval of the dastardly act of Maclay, who perverted the truth. [Applause.] If Maclay is a proper person to write history for the Naval Academy, then was the President wrong in dismissing him. If it be true, and I know that it is from the statement of my colleague from Maryland, that the Secretary of the Navy stated that the book in its then form should not be used, the inference is that in its expurgated edition it might be used. As representatives of a people who believe in fair play, we will never sanction even the expurgated edition, because we will not give character to the work of a slanderer and libeler who needs to be expurgated to get a standing in the Naval Academy of our country. [Applause.]

In other words, you may slander, you may libel, and if it goes through it is all right, but if you are held to account, then it is only necessary to modify your language to be put up in a niche with the great writers to instruct the youth of our land.

Reference was made to the recording angel of history. It was stated by the chairman of the committee that no recording angel yet existed to do full justice to all the men engaged in the battle of Santiago. I agree with him. And when that angel does get here he will not be in the form of a Maclay, and he will not dip his pen in vitriol to sear the reputation of an honest and brave man. [Applause.]

Now, if it is true that Admiral Crowninshield asserted in the presence of the Secretary of the Navy that he did not give his sanction to this history, then is Maclay once more a perverter of the truth. And if it be true that Admiral Sampson did not sanction this history, then is Maclay thrice a perverter of the truth, and deserves neither consideration nor respect from this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHIRM. The question, then, is, Shall Maclay be indorsed by us when the President has denounced him? Shall a man who has no regard for truth be indorsed by us or not? The only question that grows out of this amendment before us is the bravery of Admiral Schley and not the question of technical maneuvers. When I remember reading of his bravery in far-off Korea, where he was second to scale the battlements and receive in his arms the dead body of his leader and lay low his assassin, and then to lead his men to victory in a foreign country, I say no man can charge Admiral Schley with being a coward, not at least a man who never fought with anything but a filthy pen. [Applause.]

When I remember that he entered the frozen regions of the North and brought back the Greely explorers I know that he was fearless. From the suns of Korea to the icy climate of the North he went and never flinched. When I remember his magnificent record in the Union Navy I know that he is no coward. When I remember that Admiral Evans was behind the conning tower at the same time that Schley was outside directing the fight and watching the cannonade, and that when his officers entreated him to go to a place of safety he said, "No; I am going to see this thing out," I know he was no coward; and when I remember that the only man killed in that battle fell within 10 feet of Schley, and that Schley prevented the sailors from throwing the body into the sea, when he turned around with the calm equanimity of a man accustomed to danger and said, "No, boys; don't throw him overboard; he is entitled to a Christian burial," I know he was not fearful then. I ask you whether in the face of these facts Admiral Schley is a coward? If not, then put the seal of dishonor upon the works of the man who is not only a coward, but a base prevaricator. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to have just a word. I do not think anybody in this House, I do not think anybody in this country, thinks that Admiral Schley was or is a coward. I do not think anybody in this House or anybody in this country has any opinion about the Maclay sentences that have been referred to but thinks he was a slanderer, and I might go further and say a blackguard. The President of the United States thought so and discharged him. The book that he wrote is not used in the Naval Academy. It does not exist in that place, and yet the gentleman wants now, after the man has been discharged and his book taken out of the Naval Academy, to still expel the book and say it shall not be used there any more. Now, if it would be any satisfaction to him to do that, I have no objection; but it is a little bit like using burnt powder. I have no objection to voting with the gentleman.

Mr. SCHIRM. That is all right——

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me to make my remarks, restraining that enthusiasm, because it frightens me. [Laughter.] Now, I think they all did their duty as they saw it at Santiago. I am not prepared to criticise any of them that took part at Santiago. When Schley started one way and Wainwright started the other, I am not here to say that they both did not do right; I do not know. I can conceive that men may go different ways without either of them being in the wrong, at least without either being cowards; and I speak this without any desire by inference to criticise anybody. I am not doing it. But think of it! This slanderer Maclay, knocked clear out, kicked clear out of the service, denounced everywhere as a blackguard, and yet we halt here upon an appropriation bill to discuss this matter—to strike at this blackguard. It does not vindicate Schley. I do not think he needs any vindication. Oh, gentlemen, I think Schley behaved well enough and has reputation enough even to withstand the defense that is made by inference on the part of his alleged friends. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say that there has been no objection on the part of the Naval Committee as to this amendment—none whatever. But it struck the committee, as it evidently affected the mind of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that this was too good an advertisement for the book. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUDD. Are you against the book?

Mr. FOSS. Yes, I am against the book; but I do not think it necessary to call public attention to it. The volume in question was never used at the Academy and never will be. But if the lugging in of this matter has accomplished even the noble purpose of permitting my colleagues from Maryland to prove once again to their constituents who will rally around next November's polls that they are not only watchful of the interests of the whole country, but also guard with jealous eye the laurels of Maryland's proudest son, then indeed I am thankful. That is all.

Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MUDD. All right.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

That the appointment of 500 additional cadets at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., under such detailed rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe, is hereby authorized, such appointments to be made as follows:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to make a point of order upon the paragraph that the Clerk is just reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The time to make a point of order is after the paragraph is read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish to lose my opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the paragraph extending from line 15 to line 19, page 62?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be regarded as pending.

Mr. FOSS. I renew my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SHERMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I present a petition of the McKinley National Memorial Association relative to the erection in the District of Columbia of a national monumental memorial to William McKinley, late President of the United States. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned respectfully represent to Congress that there is a general desire throughout the United States that a national monumental memorial of William McKinley, late President of the United States, should be erected in the District of Columbia. The character of President McKinley, his public services, his tragic death, require, it is believed, this recognition. It was at first proposed that the money necessary for the erection of such a memorial in honor of President McKinley in the national capital should be raised by popular subscription, and the William McKinley National Memorial Arch Association was organized for that purpose. But upon the urgent representation of the McKinley National Memorial Association, formed to secure the erection by popular subscription of a monument at the grave of the late President at Canton, Ohio, that the prosecution of both appeals to the people would defeat both, and that the Canton monument should have the first consideration, the William McKinley National Memorial Arch Association withdrew from the field of popular subscription. The only way under the circumstances in which the general desire for a suitable memorial of President McKinley at the capital can be gratified is by the action of Congress. Your petitioners therefore respectfully pray for the passage of the bill introduced in the Senate by Hon. James McMillan, Senator from Michigan (Senate bill No. 2292), and in the House by the Hon. James T. McCleary, Representative from Minnesota (House bill 8753), which provides for a commission to select a site and secure plans for a memorial arch in honor of William McKinley, late President of the United States, to be erected in the District of Columbia.

THE MCKINLEY NATIONAL MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION,
WILLIAM R. DAY, President.

Attest:
FREDERICK S. HARTZELL,
Assistant Secretary.

I have not myself examined the bill, but I shall be glad to have it first examined by the Committee on the District of Columbia, so that the Committee on Appropriations may have the benefit of their views.

SPOKANE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. STEWART. I introduce a joint resolution fixing a time when a provision of the Indian appropriation act recently passed shall take effect, postponing its operation until certain allotments are made. The Secretary of the Interior says it will embarrass his work if the joint resolution which he recommends is not passed. I ask that it be put on its passage and that his letter be printed in the RECORD as explanatory thereof.

The joint resolution (S. R. 101) fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That that provision in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," which relates to the subjecting to entry under the mining laws of the United States certain lands in the Spokane Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, shall take effect and be operative upon the completion of allotments in severalty to Indians on said reservation, and not before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 17, 1902.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: In the enrolled bill (H. R. 11353) entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," the following legislation appears: "That the mineral lands only in the Spokane Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, shall be subject to entry under the laws of the United States in relation to the entry of mineral lands: Provided, That lands allotted to the Indians or used by the Government for any purpose or by any school shall not be subject to entry under this provision."

It is deemed very important that this legislation shall not take effect until after the completion of allotments in this reservation. The language of the provision seems to assume that the allotments to Indians have already been made. The assumption, if there be such, is erroneous. None of the lands in this reservation have been allotted, and that work has yet to be entered upon and completed. To admit miners and prospectors to the reservation, and to permit mining exploitations and operations to be carried on there indiscriminately, in advance of the allotments in severalty, and the segregation of the lands which are to be retained by the Indians from those which are to be disposed of under the public-land laws, will tend to seriously embarrass the Government on the reservation, to retard the work of allotment, and produce unfortunate relations between the Indians and the whites. The Indian agent on this reservation has telegraphed the Indian Office that in anticipation of the opening of the reservation to the mining laws miners and prospectors are entering thereon and congregating in such numbers that he is now unable to maintain discipline and order with the force at his command. It is therefore considered important that a joint resolution postponing the opening of these lands under the mining laws until after the work of allotment has been completed (a draft of which resolution is herewith inclosed) should be passed without delay, in order that it may be approved by the President contemporaneously with his approval of the bill.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be commenced condemnation of land adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard for the use of the United States for the navy-yard, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to call up the communication from the House in reference to the conference report on the omnibus claims bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 16, 1902.

Resolved, That the House further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, numbered 1, and asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS be the managers of the conference on the part of the House with the following instructions: That the conferees be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Waiving the question of instructions which the House has sent here, I move that the request of the House be granted and that a conference be appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. WARREN, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. MASON were appointed.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5213) providing for the selection and retirement of medical officers in the Army.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to select one from such medical officers of the Army as have served forty-one years or more, nine years of which shall have been as Surgeon-General, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint him a major-general of the United States Army, for the purpose of placing him on the retired list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Is it reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a report from the Committee on Military Affairs; a unanimous report.

Mr. BATE. It is a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I give notice that next Thursday, May 22, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I desire to address the Senate on the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

COMPILATION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEWART. I submit a resolution and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to have prepared for the use of the Senate a compilation of all treaties, laws, and Executive orders relating to Indian affairs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. It should go the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada if the compilation would not require more than one volume?

Mr. STEWART. No; I think not.

Mr. BAILEY. I was going to suggest that if it should require more than one volume it would be well to put the treaties, etc., relating to the Five Civilized Tribes in one part, and those relating to other tribes in the other.

Mr. STEWART. The committee will take that into consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the compilation may require several volumes, if we are to gather together all the treaties, etc., which have been made.

Mr. STEWART. The committee will regulate that matter. We intend only to have what is necessary. We are going to proceed with it in due form.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the resolution again read.

Mr. STEWART. It can be limited in its language, if the Senator desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. Ought it not to go to the Committee on Printing?

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that a great number of Executive orders, treaties, etc., are obsolete.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes.

Mr. ALLISON. But the resolution seems to embrace everything.

Mr. STEWART. We do not want to include those which are obsolete.

Mr. ALLISON. I would say "those now in force."

Mr. STEWART. I accept that amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought it not to embrace contracts enacted into law and not called treaties? At a certain time we ceased to make treaties and made only contracts.

Mr. STEWART. The resolution will cover the contracts. They have been enacted into law.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are not treaties?

Mr. STEWART. They are not treaties, but they are laws.

Mr. BAILEY. It says "treaties, laws, and Executive orders."

Mr. STEWART. Laws and treaties. The contracts are laws if they have been enacted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the resolution include them?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "now in force."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Executive orders" insert "now in force;" so as to read:

Of all treaties, laws, and Executive orders now in force relating to Indian affairs.

Mr. STEWART. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is accepted by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the whole resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to prepare for the use of the Senate a compilation of all treaties, laws, and Executive orders now in force relating to Indian affairs.

Mr. HALE. I move to add the following words:

But no extra expense shall be allowed for any work covered by this resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Then we can not get it done.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. STEWART. Let it go over. It will be impossible to do the work with such an amendment. Some extra expense must necessarily be incurred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maine state his amendment once more?

Mr. LODGE. He has asked that the resolution shall go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution:

But no extra expense shall be allowed for any work covered by this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It is to go over.

Mr. STEWART. Let it all go over.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution and amendment go over.

Mr. STEWART. It will all go over, and we will consult about the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and accede to the request of the House for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TILLMAN were appointed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, if there was anybody else who desired to take the floor on the pending measure I confess such a reluctance and timidity about it that I would very gladly yield him the floor.

For the second time during this session of Congress the Senate is occupied with questions growing out of the American occupation of the Philippine Islands. The first debate arose upon the bill fixing, for the time being, their commercial relations with us. It ran along, sometimes peacefully and sometimes tumultuously, for the space of more than a month, although in all that time the interesting little tariff bill which was the nominal subject of the discussion escaped in the noise with barely the poor consideration of a passing comment.

It was thought that when the more serious questions connected with the government of the islands were taken up the discussion would assume a more rational tone, and at least bring the Senate to a sober comparison of opinions as to that measure, unquestionably the most important constructive work which we have had to do since the civil war.

I can not forbear to express my disappointment that instead of being permitted to hear helpful and considerate criticism of the bill proposed by the majority of the committee, we have been caught in a thunderstorm of oratory which has overflowed the Senate Chamber and deluged the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without even laying the dust on the subject which for so long a time has occupied the attention of the Committee on Philippine Affairs.

And while the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] the other day made a rather impressive request for more light, a request which in his case, it must be confessed, seemed reasonable enough at the time, our friends on the other side will not misunderstand our motives, if those of us who have been looking for light on the question before the Senate accept their studied avoidance of the matter in hand as a sufficient testimonial of the patience and wisdom of those who have united in making the majority report, and even at the risk of following an evil example take up the partisan challenge which they have thrown down in their annual parade of the love of liberty and humanity which has so notoriously lifted the Democratic party above the base and common level of their fellow-men.

It is one of the infirmities of popular government that no important national project is exempt from such dissensions, though I am free to say that it is hard to find in the history of our own country a case where such an undertaking as has grown out of our intervention in behalf of the colonies of Spain has been required to defend itself against such a bewildering variety of political clamors as have filled the Capitol during the last three years.

Yet it is not necessary to judge the new leadership of the Democratic party harshly, because it is only fair to recognize the embarrassments of their situation. The rapidity with which even good things become obsolete in this world is in itself a sufficient explanation of the passionate zeal with which they hold on to the fast-disappearing differences which grew out of the war with Spain. So that if this debate has any significance at all it means that they intend to make the Philippine question an exception to their invariable custom of leaving all genuinely paramount issues to dig their way out of the débris of Presidential elections without any further assistance from their old friends.

There is, at least, a certain plausibility in the opinion which has been expressed here that the returns of 1900 were not an adequate test of the value of our Philippine troubles as a political asset, for may it not be possible that the party was handicapped in that election by the nomination of a candidate who was in a distant way connected with the Santiago campaign, and even more intimately with the ratification of the treaty of peace, out of which our obligations to Spain, to the people of the Philippine Islands, and to the world at large, arose?

It may be that the Democratic party is looking forward with the hope of keeping that issue alive in the expectation of an opening to present it without any such encumbrance. If they are, it will at least be some consolation to the hero of the first battle to remember that even before the war with Spain had been ended by the treaty, in the seclusion of his tent in Florida, he had thought out in detail a plan of operations which promised some time, whether in his own day or not, to admit the Democratic party at least to standing room in the political arena.

His counsel to his disciples was at once simple and sublime in its conception. First, ratify the treaty, and then make your political living by an open-order fusilade on the Government of the United States in its effort to do the work thereby imposed upon it. It required no supernatural forecast of events to know that when once the treaty took effect a hundred obligations fell immediately upon us, in the midst of which and even in the prospect of which it would be easy for cunning agitators to take advantage of the afflictions involved in standing up to the business which the nation of America had assumed.

And, in fact, all these fond anticipations have been realized; the losses have been grievous; the burdens have sometimes seemed too heavy to be borne; the difficulties in the way have more than once baffled our poor wisdom. Some who entered heartily in the work at the beginning, like the distinguished Senators from Colorado, have fallen by the way, while the other day in New York the weather-beaten anti-imperialist league, blown together like an eddy of dead leaves by the atmospheric disturbances here, held a belated session in order to appoint a new committee and to receive into their fellowship the author of the report of the first

Philippine Commission, who seems to have overheard enough on the cars since he came home to overrule and controvert all the opinions which he formed while he was there.

The people of the United States have patiently gone about their tremendous task, hardly taking time to notice what the Democratic politicians have been at, until now, as the election of a new Congress approaches, we find the minority of the Philippine Committee trying to lead their party into the most reckless and extravagant indictment of the Government of the United States, both in its civil and its military administration.

I am not here to utter any protest against the exercise everywhere of the right of free public discussion of every phase of our Philippine affairs, though it can not be doubted that the spirit and temper of the opponents of the Government in its effort to manage the business which it has undertaken to do have in more than one stage of our proceedings multiplied the difficulties we have encountered and added to the cares and hardships of our labors. On that account, if for no other, I have deplored, not only the course of this debate, but the general tendency of the wholesale attack which began almost as soon as the war with Spain was over.

If the influence of this pernicious scheme of accusation and calumny had been confined to the politics of our own country no Republican, I am sure, could be found to ask on partisan grounds for a cessation of hostilities; for no one interested in the welfare of the Republican party has ever had any doubt that the opposition, already in a low state of vitality from other causes, has been still further dibilitated by the ungenerous, I will not say unpatriotic, attitude of its leaders toward the Government of the United States as it has faithfully tried to work out a solution of the troublesome questions with which it has been face to face. There has never been a time in American history when a political party has not forfeited the respect of the whole people by pursuing a programme of narrow malevolence against an Administration manfully trying to bear the burdens of its day and generation.

In such a case the better qualities of human nature are enlisted on the side of the national prestige, and the fury of partisan eloquence will always be wasted in an effort to bring confusion to the public councils and failure to the national purpose. A political party needs only to persist in such a course to be finally reduced to a pitiful and grotesque minority, made up mainly of depolarized philanthropists and common scolds.

I am not therefore alarmed about the effect on popular opinion of the ignoble strategy with which the leaders of the Democratic party for four years have tried to waylay the Government of the United States in the Philippine Islands. And I have felt constrained to participate in this debate for altogether another reason.

I wish to inquire, if such an inquiry can be prosecuted through the howling wilderness of this controversy, into the differences, if there are any differences, between the method by which the Government has handled the Philippine problem and the methods suggested by those who look with dissatisfaction upon what has been done. It is fortunate that the main facts which are at the bottom of the question are public occurrences which have become historical and for that reason out of the dispute.

Many years ago I saw a book advertised, written by a celebrated Boston divine, entitled "Certitudes in Religion." I thought it would be a good book to have in the midst of the mysteries of this world, and so I bought a copy of it. But on carefully perusing it I found the field of certainty cut down to two general propositions; first, that we are here, and, second, that we are going hence. Everything else, according to this Boston authority, is the subject of polemical disquisition more or less nebulous and obscure.

Are there any "certitudes" in the Philippine situation? I venture with all humility to say that there is at least one. We are there, even though everything else is open to debate.

Some say that we are there to stay in the exercise of the sovereign rights which we have lawfully acquired; others say that we ought to abandon our position, order our troops to their transports, and depart from those waters without leaving our post-office address; others again, and these appear to be bunched on the minority side of the Philippine Committee, say that we ought to renounce our own authority, call in the nations of Europe to help us let go, and having done that, linger near for the purpose of keeping the native government on its feet.

The last two theories are in reality one. Stated in the words of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] in reply to an amiable interrogatory propounded by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], it was condensed into one sentence, a sentence so abrupt in its outburst of candor as to require a slight revision of the RECORD: "Let them go to the devil!" The bill brought here by the minority of the Philippine Committee, freely translated in the light of well-known facts, means the same thing—let them go to the devil, with a protectorate.

I venture the assertion that in all these theories of our duty the only one that is absolutely indefensible is the proposition made by the minority report, which requires us, first, to disown our right to be there at all, and then, having yoked ourselves up with Great Britain, Germany, and France, to enter upon an undefined and unlimited responsibility for everything that afterwards happens.

That such an elaborate restatement of the absurdities of the Kansas City platform should find favor in the eyes of anybody interested in the good government of the archipelago requires a new definition of human credulity. It may be possible to have two parties in the United States, one asking the people to bear with patience the labors of training the Philippine races to the stature of self-government, and another pointing to the sacrifices and discouragements of such an undertaking, and asking them to wash their hands of any further connection with it; and possibly still another, select and in every way respectable, captivated by day dreams of an imaginary Philippine republic, already but for us, exercising its mild sway over a population in many ways superior to the villages of Massachusetts at the time when John Hancock passed through them on his way to the Philadelphia Congress.

But this proposition, picked up out of the wreck of the Kansas City platform and brought into the Senate by the new Democracy of the Philippine Committee, asking us to deny the validity of our own credentials, to cashier the officers who have borne our authority, to enter into a ridiculous European partnership for the transaction of a business now strictly in our own hands, to send an apology to the brigands in all the mountain fastnesses of the islands for the temporary inconvenience we may have caused them, begging only the poor privilege of hanging around the neighborhood to superintend the anarchy we have invited, until at last we are ordered off, either by a foreign fleet or a Filipino mob; where in the United States is there room for a bedlamism like that?

I have read with great care the substitute for the committee bill reported by the minority, and I desire to acknowledge my sense of indebtedness to its authors for the confirmation I have found in it, of the faith in which our present Philippine policy has been pursued. Able speeches have been made on the other side, the ablest in recent history of the Senate, but it will require more ability than has been yet exhibited in this debate to make the speeches which we have heard square with the propositions of this substitute measure.

The substance of all that has been said is that we have and can have no material or commercial interest now or hereafter worth speaking about in that quarter; that the native population and their children after them, on account of the crimes and failures of our administration, are saturated with prejudice and hostility against us, and that the work which we have taken in hand is a visionary and impossible thing—on a par with the foolishness of feeding hay to carnivorous beasts, I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] remarked. I submit to the judgment of all if that is not a fair statement of the Democratic argument.

But if that contention is true, why should the minority of the Philippine Committee in shaping a legal expression of our present duty try to bind upon us by an act of Congress the body of this death? If we have no interest there, if everybody there hates us, if our labors there have been a failure, why should we delay our departure until we have tied ourselves up in a job lot of foreign alliances in respect to the future of this land of tragedy and sorrow?

Why should we stop to outline a provisional scheme of Philippine government? Why should we further prosecute a war for the purpose of producing a peace in which we are to have no part? If that contention be true, why should we care what becomes of the islands? What need will the United States have for naval, military, and commercial stations throughout these islands? Are we ever likely to have any stake in that quarter of the globe equal in tangible commercial significance to the interests we are asked to throw away?

The fact that after mature deliberation the minority of the committee bring in a measure containing several pages of printed matter, instead of a simple, plain, and straightforward recognition of the independence of the people inhabiting the Philippine Islands, and a direction to the President to forthwith recall our official representatives and withdraw our land and naval forces, is in itself an influential witness for the course which the Government of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of the treaty of peace, has been constrained to follow.

While the solemn instrument negotiated at Paris defined our relations with the Pacific dependencies of Spain, it did not create them. They date back to that historic morning of the 1st of May when the commodore of our Asiatic fleet transferred his flag station from Hongkong to Manila Bay.

It is a willful aspersion of the motives of the Government of the United States for any man to say that what was done there, either before breakfast or afterwards, was corrupted by a purpose to subvert any rights of the Philippine population, and if Admiral Dewey, as I have heard Senators on this floor claim, armed an insurrectionary force grouped around certain tribal chieftains, it surely can not be said that this action made it incumbent on the United States to turn over all the inhabitants of the islands, including all the foreign population of Manila, to the military dictatorship of a single man. Such a policy clearly would have subjected the whole community to an intolerable imposition, inviting universal chaos, in the midst of which every nation in Europe would have intervened for the security of their own citizens.

Much has been said intended to leave the impression that we entered the Philippine Islands with a lie on our tongues and treachery in our hearts, for the purpose of despoiling the land of its resources and the inhabitants of their liberties. It is discreditable to fill the air with such a clamor, unless somebody comes forward to identify and drag to light of day the authors of so gross an offense against mankind. The historian of these times, the student who deals with the unalterable facts of this case, will have no difficulty to find the monster who conceived and put into execution this atrocious conspiracy against the helpless people of these islands.

The policy which has been pursued has been assailed here with a rancor almost hysterical in its impotent rage. Senators have spoken by the day with words of incredible vehemence; epithet has followed epithet; accusation has been piled on accusation, as if the history of nations could be turned aside by a preconcerted series of gasoline explosions.

Gentlemen seem to forget that governments can not move amid surroundings of such difficulty in paths of their own choosing. There may be no such thing as Divine Providence, though our fathers reverently believed that there is; there may be no such thing as destiny, though I am told the word is to be found in the files of Colorado newspapers, but nobody can doubt that forces are at work in this world altogether too large to be managed from a political headquarters; that there is a course of human events not to be combatted, except at the most embarrassing disadvantages.

It is no depreciation of President McKinley to say that he looked upon the approaching conflict with Spain with fear and anxiety. He had devoted his whole life to the industrial and commercial questions which concern the investments of American capital and the wages of American labor. He had given no attention to our foreign affairs apart from the movements of commerce, and was the last man among his countrymen to give up the hope of peace.

He knew something, through the recollections of his boyhood, of the horrors or war, and better than any of his contemporaries he was able to look through the smoke of battle and beyond the noise of victory and to see distinctly, long before they came in sight of others, the perils involved in our disturbance of the peace of the world. He perceived at the time the fatal word was spoken by the joint resolution of Congress that our victory over Spain carried with it not only the enlargement of our boundaries, but such an addition to our responsibilities as to dishearten even the most adventurous mind. Some said he was weak, others that he was timid, others that he was a creature of the commercial spirit, which is always conservative and does not like to risk any interference with business conditions.

Senators are sitting before me who saw much of him during those days and nights of sleepless solicitude. He did not fear the military power of Spain. He never doubted that our operations on land and sea would make short work of her armies and her fleets.

It was not the fear of defeat that appalled him. It was the moral certainty that the triumph over Spain in her colonial strongholds had in it a portentous national liability, possibly beyond our strength, and at the very moment when his partisan opponents, in the words of the most eloquent Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, were "dragging the Republican party into the war with Spain" the overburdened Chief Magistrate of the people, with a troubled heart, was pondering the very questions which to-day engage the attention of both Houses of Congress.

I have listened with such patience as I could to the tirade of stale and calumnious insinuations which for weeks has filled this Chamber, intended to discredit the purposes and to impeach the motives of the Government of the United States in its dealings with the territory brought under our jurisdiction by the treaty of Paris. Most of the men under whose guidance these things were done, in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, in the Cabinet, in the memorable sessions of the Peace Commissioners at Paris, still live. They can answer for themselves, and I doubt not make their way through this eruption of malice and prejudice without either inconvenience or harm.

But one among them, more masterful than any other in the influence of his persuasive leadership, can no longer speak for himself. He fell in the midst of his labors at the post of his duty, in the maturity of his fame, after he had seen the work which he had wrought lifted into the light of universal history and his name enrolled among the founders of states and the lawgivers of the world's progress.

In every step of the proceedings where the opportunity to choose our course was given he exercised the part of a practical wisdom which has never been successfully disparaged. He could either have ordered Admiral Dewey, after the victory at Manila, to assemble his ships and depart from those waters, or to stay there and administer the situation his guns had created—to take care of the wreck which had been cast up by the sea. The first order would have been easy, and if it had been issued we would to-day have no Philippine problem and no paramount issue to become the football of our politics.

The President did not issue the order to retreat. Possibly he did not think of it, and there was no American, big or little, not even the micro-organisms of our politics, who did think of it till far after it was too late. Yet if we ever were to run away from the Philippine Islands that was the chance, that was the accepted time, that was the day of our cheap little salvation from the annoyances which have pestered us from that day to this.

William McKinley ordered him to stay at his post, and at once prepared the transports which carried the first detachment of our army of occupation to cooperate with his fleet. The alternative was presented to us either to go or to stay, and if there is a living American who denies that in remaining there we chose the part of courage and patriotism such a man has not comprehended even the rudiments of our national character. If we had run away, within four weeks the nations of Europe, all of them having important commercial interests there, would have been compelled to restore order out of the chaos which we had brought about.

In fact, we had a hard time to keep them from helping us preserve order even while Dewey was there, and when the record of that faithful servant of the Republic is made up the discriminating biographer will award to him as much credit for the prudence and sagacity of his administration during his long wait for the army transports as for the scientific skill with which his gunners wound up the affairs of the Spanish navy in the Pacific.

If he made any mistake at all, it was in miscalculating the value of the help offered him by the leaders of native insurrectionary troops. I have heard his relations with these leaders discussed from every point of view. I have heard the letters of our consuls in those latitudes quoted, some claiming that things were said and done there which created an alliance between us and the native forces; but to my mind there is very little sense in such a controversy, for it did not need the prompt and sharp rebuke of the President to make it clear that neither the Admiral nor the consuls were clothed with the authority to lay upon the Government of the United States any obligations to sacrifice the whole Philippine people, not to speak of the foreign residents and Spanish subjects, to the ambitions or, if you please to call them, the aspirations of a few native adventurers.

It is clear that whatever civil institutions are at last established in the islands, if they include the whole archipelago or even the whole of the island of Luzon, they must be so ordered as to represent the aspirations of the entire community, and there has never been the slightest evidence of any general aspiration on the part of the Philippine people, outside of a single tribe, to subject themselves to the aspirations of an incompetent military dictatorship.

When the Peace Commission assembled at Paris, President McKinley had no immovable purpose in mind as to what ought to be done with the islands. He had been accustomed to speak in friendly consultation with his political associates of a commercial and naval headquarters at Manila somewhat on the lines of the British settlement at Hongkong—a sort of basis of supplies and operations in which our ships might find anchorage and from which the lines of our trade could be sent out through all the market places of the East.

Strangely enough, though he chose for the work of making the treaty men everywhere counted among the wisest and greatest of our statesmen—the honored President of the Senate [Mr. FRYE]; the lamented Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota; Whitelaw Reid, the veteran American journalist; George Gray, then a Senator from the Commonwealth of Delaware, and last, but not least, William R. Day, that modest country lawyer, whose extraordinary career as Secretary of State, within less than a year's service, gave him a place among the famous diplomatists of his times—yet when it came to settling the momentous questions left undetermined by the protocol for peace the commissioners at Paris, unable to agree among themselves, turned for counsel to the President of the United States and left at last to his decision the whole question of the future of the Philippines.

He did not act in haste; he was slow to bring upon his countrymen the weight of such duties as were necessarily included in the act of assuming the sovereignty which the Kingdom of Spain was no longer in a position to defend. What was done was so entirely free from the color of national greed and selfishness that his personal correspondence with the Peace Commissioners, conducted in the name of Secretary Hay, now a part of our public records, reveals the nobility of his character and the integrity of his motives more perfectly even than the more formal utterances of his official life.

He was not dazzled by the value of the prize we had captured; he did not seek to add to the humiliation of a prostrate enemy, and above all he understood the perplexities connected with administering or even overseeing the affairs of alien and backward races. What was it, then, that brought the President to the steadfast conviction that the summons of national duty called us to lay aside the ways of pleasantness, with which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] adorned his eloquent peroration the other day, and take up the rugged task in which we have been ever since engaged?

For while the united judgment of our commissioners ultimately reached the same conclusion, after all the decision was his, and it needed only one line over his signature to have left the Philippine Islands exactly where we found them. Because that is so it has been hard for me, as I have heard the words lunatics, scoundrels, fools, thieves, murderers, land grabbers, carpetbaggers, plunderers, flying around this Chamber from the lips of all sorts and condition of Democratic statesmen, to keep my recollection from going back to those eventful days when alone in the Executive Chamber, pacing to and fro in restless meditation, weighing the circumstances in the fear of God, William McKinley set the seal of his approval upon the resolution of the American people to hold the Philippine Islands in trust for their inhabitants and to lift up that scattered population by the genius of our institutions to the privileges and the dignity of a free Commonwealth.

Having thus located the authors of this wicked conspiracy against 10,000,000 of helpless and friendless people, I wish now to inquire in a general way into the progress and development of this plot against the liberties of the Philippine races. I wish to find out what has been undertaken and what measure of success has attended the enterprise.

The first problem with which the Administration had to deal was the insurrectionary movement which arose while the treaty of peace was under debate in the Senate, and continued under normal military conditions until the collapse of the Mololos government and the flight of its military leaders to the mountain districts of Luzon. It is not easy and I do not think it is important to discuss the reasons of that rebellion against the United States, which took shape and gathered force during that long and unprofitable discussion which preceded the ratification of the treaty of peace.

I have never doubted that that period of controversy and delay brought on the disasters which have since fallen upon that people, and while I am not disposed to embitter this discussion with vain recriminations, yet it is due to truth to acquit the Government of the United States in any stage of this proceeding of any design to wrong or oppress the Philippine people.

Our Navy went there to attack Spain, and our Army went there to support the fleet. It lay in the trenches around Manila with explicit orders from the President that under no condition should it turn its guns on the native population, but on the other hand its commanding officers were charged with the duty of communicating our benignant purposes and doing whatever was in their power to win the regard and good will of the irregular militia encamped outside of their lines.

The United States was fortunate in the men selected to manage its affairs there—Merritt, Otis, MacArthur, Chaffee—all of them soldiers famous and honorable in the national service, and the American people, in my judgment, do not intend to spend very much of their time in trying to degrade their names in order to exalt the motives of the political and military cabal with which they were called upon to deal.

If the treaty had been promptly acted upon the provisional American government could have been forthwith inaugurated, and within thirty days might have reached an amicable adjustment, which would have disarmed the opposition even of the most ambitious and headstrong among the native popular leaders.

But whether that could have been done or not, it is too late now to review the mistakes and misunderstandings and follies which, in the opinion of some, were unhappily connected with the earlier stages of our military administration. If it ever was feasible to try to build up a permanent Philippine government, with the revolutionary congress and cabinet as its foundation, the prospect of that, nay, even the possibility of that, vanished when our volunteers in the trenches around Manila were compelled to fight for their lives against the aggressions of a formidable native armed force.

It is idle to say that the collision which resulted in the slaughter and flight and final destruction of that army could have been avoided. It is certain, at any rate, that with such wisdom as we had the conflict was not avoided, and to spend our time on it now serves no good purpose of any sort.

For my own part, I am satisfied that an attempt to collect the elements of a permanent civil régime around the nucleus of the existing dictatorship would have fatally impeded every subsequent attempt to establish the social and political order of the islands. And while we have succeeded in attaching nearly every important personal influence which survived the downfall of the government at Mololos to our present administration, their usefulness to their own people according to their own frank admission would have been limited indeed, without the direction of our strong hand.

It was the judgment of President McKinley, a judgment which, I think, will be affirmed by history, that underneath the civil institutions of the islands the firm foundation of our national authority must first of all be laid, and he therefore made the surrender of armed resistance the unalterable condition of peace. Under his orders the rebellion was crushed and nothing left of it except scattered bands, ineffective for legitimate military purposes, hiding in the mountains wherever they could find a safe retreat.

Our Army not only overthrew the rebellion in the field, but it did a thing which the Spanish Government had never thought possible. It pursued the guerrilla operations of the enemy over impassable rivers, through impenetrable jungles, and across the summits of inaccessible mountains. And so completely was its work done that for more than a year, throughout the whole archipelago outside of three or four disturbed provinces, the Philippine insurrection as a military proposition has been a thing of the past.

But somebody says, "How can this be so when the newspapers even now are filled with reports of battles, captures, and other military outrages?" It has been apparently almost impossible for the American people to get into their minds a picture of these islands, and the Government could well afford to put a map of the archipelago, with distances and provinces properly described in every newspaper office and schoolhouse in the United States.

For incalculable mischief has arisen from our almost habitual failure to locate the field operations of our Army. If the hearings before the Philippine Committee have had no other result than to define and identify the present scene of our warlike activities, they have served at least one useful purpose. Let me illustrate what I mean.

General Bell, trying to capture insignificant bands of roving guerrillas in the provinces of Laguna and Batangas, issued orders requiring the friendly portion of the population, that portion that desired to cast in its lot with the Government of the United States, to reside within certain specified military limits, an order absolutely necessary for the success of his campaign, and executed without hardship and inhumanity of any kind—an order which has brought peace to the distracted provinces and prepared the way for the immediate establishment of civil government.

Yet half the newspapers in the United States took up the cry that we had adopted in the Philippine Islands the Weylerism of Spain, and a considerable portion, even of intelligent people, lost sight of the 28 provinces enjoying the benefits of stable government and began again to speak the language of despair of the Philippine situation.

Not long ago, following the Balangigi massacre in the island of Samar, General Chaffee, in sending forward punitive expeditions, gave out a general order, which found its way into American newspapers, commending our troops to special vigilance and impressing the comrades of the men who had been killed by treachery to guard against similar misfortunes by treating the whole population with suspicion and distrust. He supposed that he was speaking about the island of Samar and the two remaining hostile provinces of Luzon, as the area of rebellion had dwindled to that small compass. He had himself officially reported the peaceful and prosperous situation that prevailed in practically all the other provinces.

Yet within a week after the newspapers had contained his expression about the war rebels, which included nearly everybody in the disturbed provinces, from his point of view, we find Dr. Schurman, who joined with Admiral Dewey and Professor Worcester in helping the President lay the foundation of his policy, with nothing to go on but a newspaper clipping, solemnly concluding that the terrorism inspired by guerillas and cattle thieves in the mountains of Batangas and Laguna, and the yells of bloodthirsty bolomen in the island of Samar, indicated that the whole Philippine Archipelago had been welded together by the fires of war into a solid national mass which was ready and waiting for our tardy recognition as an independent State.

I will confess that there is enough yet to be done by the Army to depress the feelings of the American people. At the same time the progress which has been made, the good and lasting work that has been done throughout the whole group of islands, outside of two or three provinces where the process of pacification has only just been finished, is such as to fill with hope and enthusiasm the heart of every man who has taken a sincere interest in the success of our arduous service of those remote and misunderstood regions of the earth.

We are not in the dark as to the present stage of our advancement toward the goal of self-government which we have set up for these islands. We have the testimony of the officers of the Army as to the military conditions prevailing in the island of Luzon. Outside of the provinces of Batangas and Laguna they agree that the active work of the Army is done, and General Chaffee's latest report indicates that General Bell has at last won a gratifying victory over the desperate obstacles with which his gallant brigade has so long contended in these two provinces. So that to-day the whole island of Luzon is living in peace, and civil government will soon be established in the two remaining unorganized provinces.

But we have not only the testimony of the officers of the Army, but we have also the report of the Philippine Commission, and especially the testimony given by Governor Taft before the Senate committee during his recent visit to the capital. He says that, accompanied by his colleagues and without military escort, he passed in perfect security from the capital of one province to another, kindly received everywhere by the inhabitants, and organized the local administration of municipalities and provinces on the basis of popular self-government, as authorized in the statutes which had been previously framed by the Commission, finding the people everywhere ready to begin the work of building upon a safe foundation the political future of these scattered communities.

So that to-day courts of justice, schools crowded with eager pupils, highways, and progressive industrial conditions have everywhere followed the surrender of the vagrant armies which had been wandering over the island ever since the capitulation of the Spanish garrison at Manila; while throughout the whole civilized portion of the archipelago, except in two or three provinces, there is peace, order, and cheerful submission to the restraints of good laws. Even the bandits, who for centuries have infested the country, have in many regions recognized the efficiency of the new order of things, as they have stood before native judges, arrested by native policemen, and answered for crimes the like of which had gone almost unnoticed for generations.

I have in my hand what I regard as the most conclusive evidence of the state of affairs in the Philippine Archipelago—the reports made to the government at Manila by the provincial authorities all over the islands, including the period since the civil government has been organized and up to January 1, 1902. These reports cover the whole civilized portions of the islands outside of Samar, and the two provinces in Luzon, Batangas and Laguna, where the disturbed conditions have only recently been pacified.

Notwithstanding my regard for the comfort and convenience of the Senate, I am disposed to read a few of them. First of all I will read the report of the governor of the province of Bulacan. I read it first because it is the province which contained the original capital of the imaginary Philippine republic. The governor, who is a native, says:

The province of Bulacan, under my charge, presents, politically considered, a sublime idea of its sincere gratitude and loyalty to the Government of the United States of America in the Philippine Archipelago.

I am justified in this statement by that very revolutionary spirit shown by the province in past times, and the readiness with which the inhabitants recognized the laudable intentions of the Government of the great North American nation in regard to this country and the urgent need for becoming thoroughly penetrated with the transcendent importance of peace, being convinced that only under peace can the welfare and uplifting of the Philippines under American rule be effected.

In fact, scarcely a month had passed by since the establishment of civil rule in this province, under the most liberal laws yet known in this country, when the most bitter of the revolutionary chiefs still in the mountains of Angat, Norzagary, and San Miguel de Mayumo, like the ex-Colonels Tecson and Morales and ex-General Torres, presented themselves before the authorities and took the oath of fealty and allegiance to American sovereignty.

From that time the province of Bulacan has been enjoying an unbroken peace, and its inhabitants, contented beyond measure with the establishment of civil rule in the Philippines, are doing all they can to strengthen that peace as a necessary basis for their happiness, thus showing their appreciation of the Government which now so wisely rules the destinies of this country.

The following is the report of the native governor of the new province of Rizal, a province named by Governor Taft out of regard for the memory of one of the greatest Philippine patriots:

Rizal Province is composed of the 19 towns formerly a part of the province of Manila and the 14 towns belonging to the districts of Morong. Provincial government established on June 29, 1901. Municipalities were organized from June to September. In almost all the towns the justice courts are already in operation.

The court of first instance has been established since July 11, 1901. Peace in Rizal is complete. All inhabitants are in favor of the civil government and devoted to American sovereignty. Highwaymen, who formerly operated in various places in Morong, have been driven out. The census is almost completed, and, from present information, the number of persons estimated at 140,000. Municipal autonomy is executed with sufficient force.

The following is from the report of the native governor of Pampanga:

At the present time this province is in the most peaceable condition. Many of the natives are highly educated, and since the introduction of the public schools under the United States Government a great improvement is noticed among the lower classes.

The finances of the province, as shown by the report of the provincial treasurer, show a balance in hand of over $28,000 United States currency, with outstanding indebtedness of less than $3,000 United States currency.

Roads and bridges throughout the province are in fairly good condition, and work on same is being pushed as rapidly as possible.

Agricultural and other industries have been prostrated on account of the ast insurrection, but are picking up again. Rinderpest has also caused great mortality among the cattle.

The few remaining malefactors and bandits in this province are being constantly traced and captured by the insular police. I believe that this province is in better condition than ever before, and under the present system of government will continue to improve, as affording an opportunity and inspiration to develop its resources.

The following is from the report of the native governor of Union, of which San Fernando is the capital. I will ask you to note the evidence of the care which is being exercised over the health of the interior of the islands for the first time in their history.

The province is perfectly peaceful and this condition has existed for over a year. People are all at work in the fields and at their various professions. Civil government is accepted on every side and there is no possible reason to think that they will ever change in this feeling under the present form of government. The treasurer reports that each municipality will close the present year with a balance on hand and without a debt unpaid. The provincial treasury will have on hand approximately $10,000 gold, $6,000 of which will be appropriations for roads, bridges, buildings, etc.

Three large bridges are under course of construction, several thousand cubic feet of stone and soil are being placed on the road where needed, and a great deal planned by this department. Everything looks very bright for the new year, and not only myself but all the provincial officers are very sanguine as to our future. January 1 will see complete reorganization of municipal police. They will be uniformed alike throughout, thoroughly equipped, and perfectly efficient.

The organization of the interprovincial mail service is working on schedule time card. There are no ladrones in Union at present, and we believe we can keep them out. It seems much to say, but conditions promise that there will be but few prisoners in provincial six months from now, when cases turned over by military have been disposed of. But two barrios in the province have smallpox, but all persons living therein have been quarantined and vaccinated with virus from Manila.

To show that a friendly cooperation between the military and civil authorities is possible, I will add the farewell address of Colonel Davis on removing his regiment from this province:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH INFANTRY,
San Fernando, January 18, 1902.

SIR: On departing with my regiment from your province permit me on behalf of my officers and myself to express the pleasure we have had in cooperating with you and your officials in the preservation of good order, and to express the hope that peace may continue to reign throughout the borders of your beautiful and healthful country, and that all your people may remain law abiding and thus secure that happiness and prosperity that must necessarily ensue.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES L. DAVIS,
Colonel Fifth Infantry.

Hon. JOAQUIN ORTEGA,
Governor of the Province of Union.

Here is a brief report from the province of Isabela, in the wilds of which, if I recollect correctly, Aguinaldo was captured:

No armed insurgents heard of in province six months. Non-Christian tribes, some friendly, some hostile to Christians penetrating territory. No reliable news from Palanan since capture of Aguinaldo. Cagayan Valley completely tranquilized; no escorts now used by civil officers.

The following is from the report of the native governor of Ilocos Sur:

That since the surrender of the nationalistic general, Tinio, with all his forces, who was carrying on the insurrection in this province, and of Father Aglipay, also with all his men, in that of Ilocos Norte, in the month of May last, this province under my command has been completely pacified, and from that time until the present all the pueblos have enjoyed the tranquillity and personal security of normal times before the outbreak of the insurrection against Spain.

As a consequence of this pacification, the natives, as well as the Americans, military and civil, inhabitants of this province, can now visit all the pueblos with entire freedom and safety without any fear whatever of even malefactors and road agents, which, fortunately, do not exist in this province. All the people are peacefully following their customary avocations to the extent that no one any longer remembers the war, save through the newspaper reports of engagements and skirmishes taking place in the provinces of Laguna and Batangas and others in the southern islands.

Nevertheless, this government does not disregard the taking of precautions and measures calculated to prevent secret emissaries of the insurgents from entering and making propaganda in the pueblos. As to this end, having learned through the municipal president of Sevilla (the smallest pueblo in this province) that he had received some proclamations from the so-called Filipino general, Malvar, a few days ago, I sent a circular to the presidents of all the municipalities of this province, recommending that they exercise the strictest vigilance over their pueblos, and should they receive or be apprised that one or more of their neighbors were receiving such documents they should transmit them immediately to this government and take such steps as they should deem necessary to the end that any person who shall labor openly or secretly in favor of the revolutionists should be arrested at once.

Notwithstanding this, I do not entertain any fear whatever that while things remain as they are public order in this province will ever be disturbed, for I am intimately acquainted with the peaceful character, industry, and respect for law of its inhabitants, despite the fact that from time to time alarming rumors are spread, especially by American soldiers and other persons ill disposed toward the tranquillity we enjoy, to the effect that General Tinio and Father Aglipay are again in the mountains recruiting men, or that the war will soon break out anew in this province.

The following is an extract from the report of the governor of the province of Ambos Camarines:

Population about 250,000; 32 organized towns; authority been requested to organize remainder of former towns; province in perfect state of pacification. Two small bands insurgents surrendered last September; since then no insurgent or hostile element in province. This condition is permanent so far as people of province concerned.

No doubt sentiment is for continued peace and confidence intentions American Government. Travel on all roads and to most distant interior points perfectly safe. I recently spent two nights in interior town with my family unguarded, where a year ago company of soldiers would have been necessary. Crime rare, and scarcely any trouble from ladrones. Only trouble in this line from occasional depredations by mountain tribes, which can be stopped by additions to armament of police.

Military force been greatly reduced, and towns formerly occupied by large garrisons now have but small detachments or abandoned entirely. Further reductions can be made, and recommend that it be done and troops taken from all towns, and, if kept in province, be placed in quarters outside towns. Some complaint of arbitrary acts by military, such as arresting persons on suspicion without cause, ordering people about, and retaining property where needed and desired for use by owner.

Some military commanders at outside places apparently not advised of existing laws as to authority of civil government and courts. Fair interest shown in recent municipal elections; no party lines except that candidates supposed to hold "Nationalista" views were defeated by large majority. Thirty-two American teachers in province, covering 17 towns. Good attendance and interest in schools. Night schools for adults well attended, and desire to learn English everywhere evident. Twenty more teachers needed.

A later report, dated January 14, 1902, says:

Absolute peace prevails in all sections. It is certain that there is not an armed insurgent within the borders of the province, and the people are loyally supporting the government. During my recent official visits I have traveled to all parts of the province, and, accompanied by my family, have visited the most remote places, unarmed and unguarded, in perfect security, meeting with nothing but kindness, courtesy, and hospitality everywhere.

Travel on all roads is safe and crime is rare. Some trouble has been experienced by people in remote barrios from depredations by mountain tribes, but these have not been of a serious nature, and will be entirely prevented as soon as the municipal police in the vicinity of the mountains are sufficiently armed and equipped.

The following is from the report of the governor of Tarlac:

There has been no interruption of the peace of the province since its organization under the provincial government act. The Philippine constabulary made several arrests in Moneada the first days of November for secretly meeting and conspiring to attack the troops. The trial is now in progress. The prosecution developed evidence implying considerable extent locally, the towns of Victoria, Gerona, Paniqui, and Anao being places to which its ramifications had spread. The defense is not yet completed. On the other hand, I was well received in towns in that part of the province recently visited, and expressions of desire for peace were numerous and seemingly earnest and sincere. I think this desire prevails.

I quote also from the report of the governor of the province of Albay, which shows not only political, but also industrial and educational conditions. Its delicate reference to the reported retirement of Governor Taft illustrates the general feeling of the people of the islands toward him.

The people and the officers throughout this province have noticed from the periodicals a report of your return to the States, but we all sincerely hope you are not leaving the islands permanently. The people have the greatest confidence in your friendship and best wishes for their welfare, and many of them have requested me to beg of you not to leave the islands permanently. To this request of theirs permit me to add that of my own—that when your duties are completed in the States we may hope to again see you in the islands.

Knowing your great interest in the welfare of these people a little information of the conditions existing here may be of interest to you. At present perfect peace prevails throughout the province. A few days after the establishment of civil government here General Belarmino presented himself with his entire force, and from that time to the present the peace of the province has not been disturbed. The people of this province are, as you are aware, Vicols, and have always been peacefully inclined.

The disturbances that have been in this province was due to outside leaders and never from the Vicol himself. A few Tagolo leaders came into the province recently from Manila with the hope of renewing trouble in this province, but the people were so thoroughly opposed to any further disturbances of the peace that there was not the slightest trouble in apprehending them before they were able to accomplish anything. These leaders were at once apprehended by the constabulary and are now confined in the prison of the province.

The constabulary have been and are doing excellent work, and their services have been highly commended upon by military officers of this province. Both the military and civil officers are in perfect accord, there being no friction whatever. I am informed by the leading citizens that there was never a time in the history of the province when it was in so prosperous a condition as it is at present.

Every man in the province who desires to work has plenty to do, and it is very seldom one sees a beggar on the streets. The wages at present being paid in this province are greater than they have ever been, the average laborer making from 1 to 3 pesos per day. The high price of hemp at present is bringing an enormous sum of money into the province, so that the provincial government has no difficulty whatever in collecting taxes, which give ample revenue to conduct the government on a very liberal basis.

Highways, buildings, and bridges are being put in repair and built as rapidly as the material and labor can be had to construct them. The cities of Albay and Daraga, which were formerly destroyed by the insurgents, are being rebuilt as rapidly as it is possible to secure material for their reconstruction. The reconstruction of these towns is not delayed through any lack of finance, but through scarcity of material. If a million feet of lumber was landed in Legaspi I believe the entire amount could be sold in less than thirty days.

Schools have been organized in all pueblos and a greater part of the barrios. The nineteen leading pueblos in the province now have American instructors, and the progress they are making is exceptionally gratifying.

I call attention also to the following extract from the report of the native governor of the province of Iloilo. He reports:

That as regards peace and order it may be asserted that this province of Iloilo has no cause to envy any other province in the archipelago. The civil rule established here has satisfied the people and completed the work of pacification commenced by the military government. It may be asserted that the people, convinced of the advantages of this rule, have forgotten all the past in order to think only of their advancement materially, morally, and politically.

Highway robbery, which is the sequence to every war and famine, far from taking hold in this province, is decreasing, thanks to the active prosecution of which it is the object on the part of the constabulary, who are doing very good service. It is to be hoped that, assailed on every side, the people of evil life will disappear.

I insert in full the report of the provincial governor of Cavite, a province which, while it lies near to Manila, is, on account of its mountainous character, one of the most inaccessible in the islands:

MENDEZ NUÑEZ, December 17, 1901.

Hon. LUKE E. WRIGHT,
Acting Civil Governor of the Philippine Islands, Manila.

SIR: On this date, I being in this pueblo of Mendez Nuñez, in my province, to hold special municipal elections, I received your telegram of the 15th instant, which my provincial secretary was pleased to transmit me, as also your courteous letter of the 12th of the same month; and in compliance with all your instructions to me I have the honor and pleasure of reporting to you as follows:

During the trip I have been making up to date to the mountain towns of this province of Cavite, organizing municipalities, I feel that I ought to entertain no doubt of the desire for peace entertained by all its inhabitants.

In this trip I have taken steps to bring about the surrender of some small armed groups, the wake, as it were, of the revolutionary forces already surrendered, which, though they still continue under arms, have no political color, and the proof of this is that they devote themselves solely to holding up native traders to get their money. And from the steps I have taken I am in hopes that within a few days all these small armed parties, that are nothing more than highwaymen, will present themselves with all their arms.

I can also assure you of the peace and order in my province, and that the civil authorities, with the constabulary forces, will be sufficient to maintain and preserve them.

This organizing of municipalities will last, at the longest, up to the 22d instant, and when completed I shall be glad to report in person to you for an interview, after which I shall return to my province to clean it up completely.

I am very much impressed with and am almost certain of the successful results of my efforts tending to attracting and surrender of all parties still under arms in this province, who are nothing more, I repeat, than highwaymen, without any political ends.

With respect to the insurgents in other provinces, I have also the pleasure of informing you that I have already found means to enable me to communicate with them, particularly with those of the province of Batangas, and if fortune favors me, perhaps my negotiations may convince them and bring about their capitulation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

MARIANO TRIAS,
Provincial Governor.

I think also the report of the governor of the province of Zambales, which is inserted in full, is not without interest, since it contains the pueblo of Macabebe:

IBA, ZAMBALES, P. I., December 16, 1901.

Hon. Mr. WRIGHT,
Acting Civil Governor of these Islands.

SIR: Your telegram of the 15th instant, in which you direct me to transmit a written report as to the peace conditions in this province, has been received by the provincial government, and I have the honor to report to you that the said conditions are truly satisfactory, so much so in fact that I can assert without the slightest exaggeration that in no point whatever of the province, including the most distant barrios of any pueblo and even in the mountains, is there noticeable the slightest sign of the existence of a revolution, and nothing remains of the former revolution but the sad evidences of the damage caused by and through the war, which are manifest, unfortunately, in the greater or less losses in property and loved ones by the inhabitants of the province; and the victims of those losses, as harmful as they are regretted, can not but still feel them, though they suffer in patience and with Christian resignation.

This perfect tranquillity and peace has been enjoyed by these inhabitants without any change or alteration since the ex-nationalistic general, Señor Tomas Mascardo, in May last surrendered to the constituted authorities. He exercised the superior command over the nationalistic guerrilla bands that were accustomed from time to time to molest one or more pueblos of the province, and to hold engagement with the forces of the American Army stationed therein, although without any advantage or benefit to themselves, and always causing the peaceful inhabitants unrest, alarm, and disquiet. These guerrillas, all attenuated and demoralized completely with that surrender, disappeared, which was very favorable to the province, and gratefully remembered by the same.

The fact is that prior to the said surrender these guerrilla bands were a constant nightmare for the peaceful citizens. The barrios situated at a distance from the pueblo became more and more deserted, being abandoned by their inhabitants, owing to the frequent attacks upon their persons and their interests, the guerrillas seizing both when least expected. The farmers, who compose the greater part of the inhabitants of the province, could not, without exposing their personal safety, devote themselves to their ordinary occupations when necessary to do so at points far removed from the pueblo. The traders who were compelled, in order to gain their livelihood, to pass from one pueblo to another, could only do so when the occasion presented itself to be protected by the American military forces who, in the line of duty, passed from one pueblo to another over the same route the former usually follow.

The stock raisers withdrew their stock from the pasture lands to prevent their becoming the object of the rapacity, compulsory or otherwise, of the guerrilla bands, thus exposing the stock to dying of hunger for want of food. In a word, all the inhabitants unwillingly withdrew from working out their material progress and prosperity, this being, however mournful and regrettable, better than losing their lives in the effort to secure their own happiness; and therefore no one could live at peace with God and man unless it were within the pueblos protected by American military detachments.

But now, ever since the ex-nationalistic general, Mascardo, surrendered, there is no repetition of these sad events, and the whole province, as though by magic, is animated to make up with interest their losses by devoting themselves with greater energy and ardor than heretofore to labor, not only because it has returned to its normal and peaceful life, but also by reason of the content and enthusiasm it feels through the implanting of the civil rule and the establishment of several schools for the teaching of the English tongue in many pueblos of the province. The whole of the latter may now be traveled without any personal or material risk whatever and without the protection of an armed force.

So true is this that the inhabitants of the pueblo of Macabebe, province of Pampanga, who, it is well known, are hated by the Nationalists, come and go from that province to this one freely, without anything happening to them on the road, carrying to and selling in the different pueblos and barrios, as they did during the former domination, their native cloths, made in different places. The children of both sexes as never before devote themselves with ardor, application, and profit to the study of the English language.

This is all I can report to you in compliance with your foregoing telegram and in honor of the truth.

Respectfully,

POTENCIANO LESACA,
Provincial Governor.

I insert also in full the report of the governor of Pangasinan:

LINGAYEN, December 17, 1901.

THE ACTING CIVIL GOVERNOR OF THE PHILIPPINES.

SIR: In answer to your telegram of the 15th instant, asking for a report on the state of peace and the general conditions of the province, I have the honor to inform you that since civil régime has been established the inhabitants enjoy perfect tranquillity and comfort, and that their conditions are growing better each day under the new régime.

Peace is so well established that it has never been disturbed in the slightest, although we have discovered some small remains of the robber bands, formed of coarse and ignorant people, which existed in the province during the past revolutions and try to cover their misdeeds with some sort of political color, but the matter has no importance whatever.

The court of first instance has investigated the question, and has already released the 36 men who had been arrested in the municipality of Tayug, as they had been deceived by the so-called "guards of honor," and 24 others are still in jail waiting to be tried.

Very respectfully,

P. SISON,
Provincial Governor.

A later report, dated January 15, 1902, says:

During the year 1901 the inhabitants of the province have enjoyed and are enjoying perfect peace. The roads and bridges have generally been sufficiently repaired and rebuilt, as also the provincial buildings, such as the government house, the provisional prison, and the park of the capital. Where the work is not finished, it is carried on with the greatest activity. The provincial board has voted an appropriation for the purchase of important elements of transportation for the materials necessary for road building, so that the work may be done with the greatest possible amount of solidity and economy. The schools are attended by the children of both sexes.

Some of the municipalities insist on having American teachers, as it has been impossible to provide all the pueblos with them. The assessment of the property is progressing, and all the other contributions are collected with the greatest regularity. The rice crop, which is being gathered, is plentiful. In many municipalities houses and other buildings are being repaired and constructed. Agriculture, industry, and commerce, are making considerable progress. Under the present civil régime the general conditions of the province are daily improving, as well as the private interests of the inhabitants.

The following is an extract from the report of the governor of the province of Sorsogon. It is specially interesting because it shows that the native constabulary knows how to handle local uprisings:

SIR: In compliance with instructions contained in telegram from the civil governor, I have the honor to report that the conditions in the province of Sorsogon are satisfactory.

I personally have just returned from an overland trip, visiting all of the towns south of Sorsogon and passing through the wildest and roughest part of the country. The trip was made without a guard, and in all the towns and barrios the spirit of the people seemed to be the best.

The province has recently recovered from a local uprising, not of any political significance, but due purely to the ignorance of the populace in following a few unprincipled leaders who led them from motives of personal gain and who are not natives of this province. The matter was promptly taken in hand by the military authorities and the constabulary, and with the very material assistance of some of the presidentes and "principales" the uprising was soon quelled and the leaders nearly all captured or killed.

The general feeling among the intelligent portion of the population is good, and when they realize that they hold the power of leading the ignorant in the right direction and exercise that power for the general good, there will be little danger of further trouble in the province, as the people are naturally pacific and desire to live in peace. I can now begin to see some results of our work and instruction in this direction, and the municipal officers and some of the more intelligent of the people are beginning to realize that they have a further responsibility to their country and the government than remaining passively inactive and watching the Americans put down uprisings.

The following is an extract from the report of the governor of the province of Batan:

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have recently made an inspection of and visited all the towns in this province, and find the people entirely in accord with the government as established and expressing freely and unanimously their appreciation and approval of the forms of the government—municipal, provincial, and insular—now existing. The local governments of the municipalities are conducted in an intelligent, judicious, and praiseworthy manner.

There has not yet been a single abuse or breach of trust committed by an official since the establishment of civil government in the province, March 2, 1901. The local governments of the municipalities are conducted in an intelligent, judicious, and praiseworthy manner. There has not yet been a single abuse or breach of trust committed by an official since the establishment of civil government in the province, March 2, 1901. The financial accounts are in a healthy condition; all the towns are accumulating money in the treasuries, some having $3,000 at the end of last month on hand, with the intention of building schoolhouses first and other public improvements next.

The following is from the report of the governor of the province of Nueva Ecija:

The province is and has been free from any insurrectionary movement since the establishment of civil government in the province, July 2, 1901.

I insert also the report of Captain Grant, who was appointed governor of the province of Leyte, an island remote from Luzon, the disturbed conditions of which, since this report was sent in, have been emphasized by the newspaper accounts of the complaints of Captain Grant against the Army officers now in the island:

I have the honor to report that the peace conditions of this province are fairly satisfactory. The only armed resistance to constituted authority, so far as is now known, consists of a band of ladrones under the leadership of the two Capili brothers, who are reported to have about forty guns, of all kinds, the majority of which are unserviceable, while their supply of ammunition is very limited and of poor quality, most of it being of their own manufacture.

The people, generally, are anxious for civil government, and the officials elected in the various towns are developing, as a general rule, a very high degree of intelligence in the performance of their respective duties.

That the great majority of the people are happy and contented with their present condition is evidenced by the renewed activity displayed in all branches of industry. Agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industries are taking on new life throughout the province, while the people are rebuilding their towns and homes, and are erecting, in many instances, substantial and comfortable buildings, instead of nipa shacks.

One of the most gratifying, and, to my mind, one of the most encouraging indications as demonstrating their appreciation of our institutions, as well as the popularity of the same, is the intense interest manifested among the masses to acquire a knowledge of the English language. During the current year the municipalities in this province have expended about 10,000 pesos in the construction and equipment of schoolhouses, which I think is quite a good showing for newly organized towns just recovering from the effects of a two or three years' war.

There are at present 33 American teachers on duty in the province, all of whom are doing excellent work. It affords me much pleasure to report that, with but one or two exceptions, there has been absolutely no friction between the padres and the schools, while quite a number of the padres have exhibited a desire to learn our language.

Let me add also this extract from the report of the province of Capiz, in Panay, which shows the expiring breath of the insurrection:

So pronounced is the public spirit for the preservation of order and the maintenance of civil institutions that at the beginning of October last, shortly after the unhappy event at Balangiga, island of Samar, some bad patriots with perverse intentions spread the rumor that 40 revolutionists, well armed with rifles, from Samar, had disembarked, and that on the 1st of November the bolomen were going to cut the throats of all the Americans and Americanistas.

These rumors found echo in the military, who took every kind of precautions, despite the fact that from reports received by this government the whole thing was false and intended only to alarm the people and see if the pueblos would become disturbed. The result was that all the pueblos unanimously were vigilant in their desire to maintain peace and disposed to sacrifice themselves in the interests of order, as was reported by the presidentes of the pueblos in reply to recommendations made by this government.

Recently, owing to the fact that the police in many pueblos have only bolos for arms, and the news having reached the ladrones that the American forces stationed at some towns will not leave their quarters, even when the barrios near the pueblo are attacked, as has already happened, the ladrones have become emboldened and have committed many robberies, carrying off carabaos belonging to the poor people who live outside the pueblo.

The public instruction is giving very favorable results through the appointment of American teachers, and already the number of children who begin to speak English is quite large, and all of them are anxious to become acquainted with the modern American methods of instruction.

Very respectfully,

S. JUGO VIDAL,
Provincial Governor.

The following is from the report of the governor of the province of Abra:

Assumed command Abra, March 27.

The insurrection at that time being very active, drastic measures were necessary, in consequence of which the surrender of all under arms was accomplished before May 1. Since then peace has reigned throughout the province. Civil government was established September 1, since which time we have been busy reorganizing the several pueblos.

All men are hard at work planting and building. No ladrones; very slight breaches of the peace. Safe for all to travel anywhere. Province is poor and needs assistance, money for roads being the first requirement. Industrial schools recommended, also sawmills, gristmills, etc. Schools in prosperous condition; the people seem contented and happy, and will remain so unless some hothead for personal reasons inaugurates strife. The people of Abra are a class of themselves.

The report of the governor of Marinduque is so brief that I insert it in full:

BOAC, MARINDUQUE, December 25, 1901—4.45 p. m.

CIVIL GOVERNOR, Manila:

Replying to your telegram 18th, received this date, letters as per request have been mailed. Marinduque is enjoying peace, happiness, and prosperity, so that American Army officers and civilians travel through the province alone and unarmed, as they would in their own country. Marinduque is engaged in peaceful avocations, and sincerely loves America and has faith and confidence in the future.

PARAS, Governor.

The governor of Cagayan reports as follows:

Peaceable condition of province is general and thoroughly established, which can be understood by contemplating the enthusiastic reception made to me at all towns where I hold municipal elections. People are very favorable to establishment of civil government and very obedient to the United States.

The provincial authorities of the island of Masbate say:

Peace is so completely established in the province that there is not so much as a gang of robbers in the whole territory. The provincial government and the municipalities are doing their work with regularity, and the people are deeply thankful for the benefits derived from the civil régime.

In the pueblos which have teachers the study of English is progressing. The people have a strong desire to learn the language, and it will be necessary to send teachers to all the pueblos; there are only 6 teachers for 17 pueblos.

The following is an extract from the report of the governor of the province of Misamis, one of the more backward provinces:

From Yligan to Gingo-og, including the island of Camiguin—that is to say in the east region, in which Cagayan, the capital, is situated—the perfect tranquillity of normal times is enjoyed, rarely interrupted by some evil deed on the part of the Moros of the Laguna de Lanao, in the neighborhood of Yligan exclusively, as has been their practice in all times.

Things are different in the other part of the province, from Misamis to Langaran, where the insurgent general, Rufino Deloso, is actively pursued by the American troops. Hardly any news is received from that region, for the reasons above mentioned, except by the military authorities, which have a cable and a steam launch. The local civil authorities never report by cable or letter any matter concerning the military operations, as the military elements have adopted such rigorous measures that they are terrified and do not dare even ask for information, for fear of misconstrued interpretation.

IMPORTANCE OF GENERAL DELOSO'S FORCES.

Gen. Rufino Deloso and his forces have been given much more importance than they deserve. He has only a few men with him (50 according to public rumor), and the principal inhabitants of that part of the province have shown him marked coldness and given me proofs of their strong desire to enjoy civil life under the new laws which rule the other pueblos. I can affirm that with a just and impartial policy, and the use of some tact on the part of the military authorities in their relations with the civil elements, complete peace and tranquillity would soon be obtained.

Following is an extract from the report of the provincial government of Occidental Negros:

Since the 6th of November, 1898, the island has had three distinct governments: First, the revolutionary government; next, the provisional one, after November 6, 1899, and, finally, the present government, after May 1, 1901. The two first were half civil and half military, the last purely civil. This succession of three distinct organizations amidst relative peace and tranquillity had brought the people of Occidental Negros to their present situation. Civil régime is not entirely new for them, although they appreciate its great advantages and its beneficial influence on all phases of public, private, political, and economic life.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

Civil government was established nine months ago, and although this is a short period in which to appreciate the character of a political epoch, one feels already among the people the first signs of an era of contentment and love for a régime which had been so long desired, which can not fail to lay for the future the stable foundations of a radical and deeply autonomous constitution.

If, while war was raging in other provinces, its contagious blasts were hardly felt here before they were extinguished by the prudence of the wise governors of Negros, and, above all, by the opinion of the people, which has shown unanimously that it is opposed to an irreconcilable policy; if, during the most critical moments of the revolution, Negros was considered by natives and foreigners as a paradise of tranquillity, it is useless to describe its present situation under the auspices of civil régime, which has always been the object of the wishes of all the inhabitants, who have never been induced to wander from the road which they have so happily followed. The only atmosphere here is one of peace, and hearts only beat for the prosperity of the province.

I append also an extract from the report of Julio Llorente, governor of the province of Cebu:

The conditions of surrender presented by the Commission were nearly all accepted by General Hughes and, as a result, Maxilom and all his forces became law-abiding citizens, and so complete has become the establishment of peace in this province that not a single gun belonging to insurgents has remained in the field. And those who surrendered are giving proofs of this patriotism and await resignedly for the time when peace shall be declared to reign throughout the entire archipelago, when they will recover the exercise of their political rights.

The governor of the province of Bohol says:

I have the honor to confirm the fact that the province of Bohol is now pacified.

The following is an extract from the report of the native governor of the province of Ilocos Norte:

As it was to be hoped, the establishment of the provincial government, with its provincial board, and of the municipal governments, with their municipal councils, have been and are most favorably received by all the inhabitants, although they were far from knowing, when they intrusted to their municipal governments the absolute management of the pueblos, that such municipal governments must be composed of competent and intelligent men, worthy of the honor which is done them, and capable of performing the duties of their office, as the most powerful element for obtaining the prosperity and the happiness of the pueblos is now intelligence and not force.

Popular election, which is an excellent system in civilized countries, where the rights of election and of vote are well known, where liberty is well understood and the necessity for intelligence, and not force, recognized by the citizens, is rather premature in this province, where what happens is just the opposite. I will not say that popular election is a bad system in this province; on the contrary, it is excellent for the people to learn its advantages as soon as possible; but for this purpose it would be better not to allow the people, for some time to come, at least, to elect the municipal officials, such as the president and vice-president, who ought to be appointed after proper investigation of their character, their capacity, and their legal competency, although the municipal councilors might be elected by popular vote as a trial and for the instruction of the people. My opinion is in favor of the adoption of legislative measures in that regard.

In some of the provinces friction has occurred between the civil and military authorities, and this has been especially noticeable in the few provinces where it was impossible to secure properly qualified native governors.

Such a province is Tayabas, where Maj. Cornelius Gardener, whose charges against the military authorities are now under investigation at Manila, is governor. It lies near the disturbed area of Batangas and Laguna. Nevertheless even here, in spite of his complaints against the Army, Major Gardener bears important testimony. Among other things he says in his report:

The work of the Philippine Commission and the laws that have been enacted by it are everywhere favorably commented upon by the natives. The efforts being made for the general education of the people are appreciated by all. The provincial government and municipal governments established are slowly bringing order out of chaos and anarchy, and there begins to be visible everywhere in this province progress and prosperity. True loyalty and contentment can only come under a benign civil government.

In Batangas, the most difficult of all the insurrectionary provinces to manage, the provincial secretary, Florencio R. Caldo, writing to the civil governor at Manila, on the 18th of December, 1901, in the midst of General Bell's campaign, which has now fortunately been crowned with complete success, after describing the unfortunate conditions of the people of the community, says:

The committees of the Federal party having been created in the pueblos of the province since February last, civil rule having been inaugurated and established since the May following, and the pueblos having been organized into municipalities pursuant to the existing municipal code, with the exception of Cuenta, Taysan, and Rosario, all of us who were lovers of peace and order hoped that those who were still in arms would surrender and recognize American sovereignty, in order to enjoy the benefits of that rule with us.

But the revolutionary leaders, miserably deceived by the revolutionary committee of Hongkong, and all of them, down to the last private, being the rulers over the life and property of the poor farmers who live outside the immediate protection of the American forces, have wished to remain in arms, for if they surrender the greater part will become vagrants, accustomed as they are to living at the expense of others.

Nevertheless, through the efficient measures which the illustrious General Bell is beginning to take, such as the blockade of the ports of this province and the prohibition of all trade, it is to be hoped that within a short time the desired peace may be secured. All the more since all the pueblos are clamoring for it and willing to lend their valuable assistance to its securement.

These reports cover the whole island of Luzon, except one province, and practically the whole civilized portion of the archipelago, which from one end to the other is now living under our peaceful authority.

I will only add an extract from the report of the chief of the Philippine constabulary, which indicates the present state of the native police force which is to be the future right hand of the insular government. He says:

The constabulary forces are fairly well organized (though the ranks are not completed) in all the provinces except Principe, Infanta, Mindoro, Samar, Zamboanga, Cattabato, Davao, Jolo, Paragua, Batangas, and Laguna. In the two last-named provinces only inspectors and special service men are working. We are now able to hold the following provinces without troops: Abra, Bontoc, Union, Lepanto, Benguet, Nueva Viscaya, and Bataan, likewise Principe and Infanta whenever it may be required. Within three months from this date it is believed that troops may be concentrated in a single garrison in at least eight provinces and that there will be others that can be held by the constabulary without troops.

On December 15 the constabulary had in round numbers 2,500 men. The great care exercised in recruiting this force accounts for the fact that this number is not larger, but is indeed worthy of remark that up to the present time only two men have been lost by desertion.

He adds:

When Malver in Batangas and Lukban in Samar are killed or captured the work in this archipelago will consist chiefly in destroying the numerous bands of robbers, variously called tulisanes, ladrones, alsados, babylanos, dios-dios, etc., and in this work the constabularly will be specially valuable, as shown by the beginning already made.

The general condition of the islands, as regards pacification, has never been so favorable as now, when the crumbling from the top is duly manifest. The new Association of Peace was organized, and its work is being carried on by the extreme group of politicians, journalists, and intransigentes, who have until now been responsible for the continuation of the insurrection. In my opinion the campaign in progress in Batangas and Laguna will be the coup de grâce of the insurrection and will prevent our trouble in the Philippines from becoming chronic.

The record of this work reflects infinite honor upon the Commission which has executed it, upon the American Army which made it possible, and upon the people of the United States who stood by President McKinley in the national election which saved the Philippine Islands to civilization.

To Governor William H. Taft, more than to any other man, belongs the credit of this benign interpretation of the national policy.

Unlike my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], who does me the honor to listen to me this moment, he was not an original enthusiast on the acquisition of the islands. The President sent for him, and he carelessly boasted before he had had an opportunity to see him that he had not the slightest intention of going into any such business. He was judge of a circuit court of the United States, and before him there was a prospect clear as day to sit in the Supreme Court of the United States. He said he was opposed to the policy and knew nothing about it and cared nothing about it. He thought it was a blunder and a course of political stupidity.

President McKinley pressed his duty upon him. He was five hours in the President's private apartments, and when he came out he had been over the road to Damascus, a road which Victor Hugo says every man must travel who looks to any great achievement in this world, for he himself told me that in those five hours he received an altogether new revelation of the significance of a man's relation to the world in which we are living. And so, easily and happily, he turned his back on the emoluments of a great profession, laid aside the ambitions of a great career, gathered his wife and children about him, and went out from among his kindred and his countrymen to become the servant of strange peoples in their blind struggle toward a larger and a better opportunity.

His perfect comprehension of the problems involved, his brotherly heart leaning toward that people with a tender sympathy, his manly confidence in his country, his invincible optimism rising above all doubts and all fears—these have been the guaranties of his success, and these are the moral qualities that will place his name among the great figures in the history of our time.

He came here from a bed of sickness, and while he was here his body was racked with pain. Yet he could not keep to himself his anxiety to get back to his people, and when the other day he bade us good-by and anxious friends were heard to inquire about his health he told them in words which thrilled me as few things have thrilled me in all my contact with men and with affairs that if he knew he was going back to the Philippine Islands to die, nevertheless he would desire to be about the business which had been committed to his hands. My countrymen, it is impossible to overshadow the lofty heroism of a mission like that with the noise and dust and tempest of partisan controversy in the Senate.

This responsibility of ours is not a party responsibility. It is as completely national as the declaration of war against Spain. Men of all parties were with the late President when he began the work. Men of all parties will be with Theodore Roosevelt as, with a brave heart, keeping close to the counsel of the men who were nearest to McKinley when he died, he carries out in good faith the promise which he made to the American people in the hour of national sorrow, when he took upon him the oath of his high official duty.

Nor can this be a sectional question. The other day I heard a gallant knight step forth and offer his lance to defend the South if it should be attacked. The South is not likely to be attacked in this debate, and I warn those who are saving their ammunition to defend the South that they will have other need for their resources. A new generation is now on the stage of action in the United States, a generation which refuses to rekindle the fires of old animosities long since burned out, a generation that concedes to every section of the Union the right to work out the problems that have come upon them in the progress of society, not even offering them advice, but sympathy and good will rather, in the ordeal through which they are yet to pass.

For one I find comfort in the fact that to-day the affairs of the Philippines are in the hands of a broad minded rebel general, Luke E. Wright of Tennessee, honored as few men are honored throughout the South, and I never think of the trials of our little army in Luzon without seeing in my mind's eye a little old rebel cavalryman by the name of Joe Wheeler, yonder on the other side of the world, riding at the head of his division defending the sovereignty of the Republic, under our flag, the flag that never did stand and never can stand for anything except the liberties of the human race.

Nearly fifty years ago Mr. Seward, speaking in the old Senate Chamber where the Supreme Court now sits, caught a prophetic glimpse of the future. He saw the conquest of the Rocky Mountains and the Bay of San Francisco filled with ships; he saw the isthmian canal opened to the nations. He saw the unnumbered millions of the East, touched at last by the mighty forces of the modern world, making the Pacific Ocean the appointed highway of our traffic with far-off lands, then mysterious or unknown.

Within that fifty years the Empire of Japan has risen up out of the ocean and to-day grasps the hand of Great Britain in a solemn covenant to guard the territorial unity of China and the equality of all commercial rights, while near at hand, on the very borders of Asia, are these islands, taking their first feeble steps toward constitutional government under our guidance; and I say to you, reflecting on the sacrifices we have made, counting the treasure we have poured out like water, considering the obligations we are under, and measuring the interests that are at stake, the Congress of the United States is just as likely to cede back the Mississippi Valley to the lawful heirs of Napoleon The Great as it is to leave the Philippine Archipelago to become a spoil of anarchy or a prize for European diplomacy. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

F. E. WARREN,
WM. E. MASON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

THAD. M. MAHON,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
T. W. SIMS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the paper which I send to the desk may also be read. It is brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL, 1902.

Amount of bill as passed by the House	$213,105.51
Net increase by the Senate	2,929,252.09
Amount of bill as passed by the Senate	3,142,357.60

Of the increase made by the Senate of $2,929,252.09 the House has agreed to $1,405,393.35, and the Senate has receded from $1,553,172.74, making the total of the bill, direct appropriation, as agreed to in conference, $1,618,498.86.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in explanation of this conference report I beg to say that the report is precisely the same as the first conference agreed upon, except that, first, the language is changed a little in stating a mode of settlement of the Nevada State claims, and, second, we have cut out all of the so-called Selfridge board claims, amounting to $1,072,425.39.

Your conferees have not surrendered their convictions or their belief in the merits of the Selfridge board claims which have been taken out, but it is perfectly plain to me, and it must be plain to every Senator, that parliamentary practice—law, perhaps I should say—demands that we now should make the concession which has been made.

The omnibus claims bill which came to the Senate from the House carried but a little over $200,000. Of course we understood that behind it was the expectation of the House that it would be very largely increased in the Senate. We increased it about twelvefold. The amendment was about twelve times as large when the bill was reported to the Senate and passed.

This increase was made up of certain classes of claims which had reference to each other and certain claims and classes of claims having no reference to each other. Therefore the taking out of one class of claims not connected with other classes does not interfere or change in any way the balance of the bill. It is simply taking off certain items complete in themselves.

The House has three times—once informally and twice formally—expressed itself against these particular claims during the past two weeks, and each time with an increased majority. Your conferees believed that since the Senate placed so many claims in the bill, and since the House accepted the larger portion of the Senate amendments, it was the duty of the Senate to finally recede. Therefore your conferees surrendered to the demand of the House to cut out the Selfridge board claims.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Wyoming be good enough before he yields the floor to state to the Senate in a moment the general nature and character of what he calls the Selfridge board claims? There are some Senators who do not know them by that name, or some persons who will read the debate may not know the character of the claims.

Mr. WARREN. I think perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber when I made some explanation of these claims last week.

Mr. HOAR. I know myself what the explanation is, but I wanted the Senator in this connection to explain the Selfridge board claims, if he will do so.

Mr. WARREN. These claims represent the findings of the Selfridge board which was convened June 5, 1865, and which was presided over by Commodore Thomas O. Selfridge, the other members being Montgomery Fletcher, chief engineer, and Charles H. Eldredge, paymaster, all officers of the United States Navy, selected by the Secretary of the United States Navy to take up and consider the claims of certain contractors for extras in the building of vessels.

Mr. HOAR. During the civil war.

Mr. WARREN. During the civil war. At the time or shortly after the Monitor sunk the Merrimac there seemed to be an awakening of the Federal Government to the desirability of ironclads and light-draft boats, and it immediately proceeded to construct a large number of light-draft boats and gunboats and, in fact, the United States precipitated itself into a sort of indiscriminate building of boats, without mature plans, getting contracts where it could, by inviting bids and almost or quite forcing contracts, in other cases by stating to the contractors that unless they conformed to the wishes of the Department their works would be taken possession of by the Government.

In justification of this statement I ask to insert in my remarks the following letter from one of the builders:

NEW YORK, February 6, 1902.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to submit a few facts in regard to the matter discussed in the House some days ago, viz, the Selfridge board cases. On behalf of our company, the Allaire Iron Works, of this city, I would call your attention to House Report No. 19, made January 7, 1902, on bill No. 5898, introduced by Hon. Amos J. Cummings. In that report is embodied the affidavit of the secretary of our company, stating the facts fully, and, I think, clearly.

Our works were invited by the Navy Department to build engines and boilers for steamers known as double-enders. We went carefully over the drawings, estimating weights, labor, cost of material, etc., and found that we could not do the work for less than $115,000 for each—i. e., for boiler and engine for each steamer; and this was the bid of the Allaire Works.

Subsequently, Mr. Isherwood, then Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, Navy Department, called on us, and said that the Secretary was anxious to have the engines and boilers built, but would give only $82,000, as he had bids at that figure. We told him they could not be built for that price. He replied that they would weigh but little, if any, more than the engines and boilers of the steamers of the Paul Jones class. We assured him that our estimate of the weight of the proposed boilers and engines was about 500,000 pounds, while those of the Paul Jones class weighed about 375,000 pounds each.

Mr. Isherwood said the Bureau had gone over the plans, and estimated that the proposed boilers and engines, though larger than the Paul Jones class, would be of lighter iron, and the weight would not vary materially from those of the Paul Jones class.

Upon the refusal of the Allaire Works to make a contract to build any of these engines and boilers for the price offered by the Government, viz, $82,000, Mr. Isherwood stated that he was instructed by the Secretary of the Navy to inform them and the other engine builders who declined to build at the price offered that unless they did make contracts at the Government's price, $82,000, the Government would seize their shops as a war measure, and build the machinery themselves.

Under this threat, and with the hope that the weights, as stated by Mr. Isherwood, would be found to be correct, we entered into contract with the Department for two engines and boilers on August 30, 1862. They were completed and delivered to the Government, engines and boilers, as follows: Engines and boilers for the Mattabesett, December 1, 1863; engines and boilers for the Shamrock, March 1, 1864.

Upon the most carefully kept cost of every item, we found that the machinery of each weighed 561,565 pounds, being nearly 200,000 pounds in excess of the weight of the Paul Jones class, and, as estimated by Mr. Isherwood, the actual net cost of each was $107,119.07, entailing a loss of $50,238.14.

We had to sign a receipt, of course, for what we were paid, but that receipt was for $50,238.14 less than the net cost. We appealed to the Navy Department. The Department recognized the absolute justice of our appeal and loss.

We were directed to go before the Selfridge board with all our books, papers, vouchers. We went. The board, appointed by the Secretary in pursuance of Congressional mandate, reported that our loss was $50,238.14.

That, honored sir, is our case. We submit that it is just. No receipts in full were given, or could be given; only receipts for $82,000.

For years we have done all in our power. We can do no more. Is it just that we should lose the money we claim? We did not want the contract. We knew we could not do the work without great loss. We took it under the circumstances I have stated to you.

In view of these facts, we hope you will see the absolute justice of our claim.

Very respectfully,

THEODORE S. MILLER,
Of Allaire Iron Works.

Now, Mr. President, the matter of adjudicating these claims was neglected for some time. Finally, on a resolution of the Senate, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Selfridge board was constituted, and its findings have remained standing to the credit of these contractors.

There has been some confusion and misunderstanding as to the two different boards which had to do with the settlement of most of these boat claims. As to the seeming conflict between the Selfridge and the Marchand boards, both were organized by the Secretary of the Navy, and he appointed officers of the Government as members. The Marchand board was not convened and was not organized to retry the Selfridge board claims. The Marchand board was organized to try an entirely new class of claims which had presented themselves after the Selfridge board.

Taking the boards in order, the Selfridge board was the first.

The action of the Secretary of the Navy was in obedience to the resolution adopted by the Senate March 9, 1865, which directed "that the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. None but those that have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

The resolution establishing the Selfridge board limited the class of claims that could be brought before it; and it limited it to those claims in which the work performed had given satisfaction to the Navy Department, and only those could be considered.

This was held by the Selfridge board to include only such vessels and such engines as had been completed and accepted by the Government. When the Selfridge board was established there were many of these vessels that had not been completed, many of them that had not been accepted by the Government, and the same condition of affairs applied to them as to the others. Under the ruling of the Selfridge board these others could not be considered by that board. Hence the necessity of a new tribunal to consider the new class of claims which had arisen.

The Selfridge board was created by an act of a coordinate branch of this Government, and appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and it sat and discharged its duties; and the other, the Marchand board, was created by the joint action, but they were both boards representing the interests of the Government, and nothing else.

The Government was represented by the naval officers, and they had the testimony of the naval officers. The following witnesses were examined by the Government before the Selfridge board: United States Naval Constructors Pook and Delano; Chief Engineers Purse, Albert, King, Brooks, and Lawton; Government Inspectors Childs, Lowry, Betts, Hughes, and Drake, each of whom was examined fully, under oath. They were all examined under oath before the Selfridge board. They were called in there to protect the interests of the Government.

Further, this board was in correspondence with Rear-Admiral Gregory, who had charge of the gunboat contracts, with the Secretary of the Navy, with Chief Engineer Denby, with John Lenthol, Chief of the Bureau of Construction, and B. F. Isherwood, Chief of the Bureau of Engineering, and Chief Engineer Fletcher, who from time to time made personal investigation as testimony was offered to the board.

I should say that about half of the boat claims, taking Selfridge, Marchand, and Boggs board claims, have been already paid, the assertions made and scattered about in printed form by an obscure, untruthful, unauthorized person to the contrary notwithstanding. There has been passed in almost every Congress for thirty years some bill or bills covering some of these various boat claims. In the last omnibus claims bill that passed we paid the Portland Company, for the Agawam and Pontoosuc, $64,698.97; we paid George W. Lawrence, for hulls for the Agawam and Pontoosuc, $13,777.24; we paid George W. Quintard, for the Onondaga, $68,163.13, and we paid Thomas F. Rowland, for the Muscoota, $57,252. And many bills had passed before in payment for similar claims.

Those amounts represent 80 per cent of these particular claims as the Selfridge board found them. A cut of 20 per cent was made on the demand of the House conferees, not because the claims were not right; not because the amount was too large, but because they wished to reduce the total of the omnibus bill, and the 20 per cent cut applied to large Bowman Act claims as well as to these.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to say one word about the Selfridge board claim, and I may as well say it now as at any time. I entirely concur with the wisdom or the necessity, whether it is wise or not, of the course adopted by the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

The Selfridge board claims, if I understand them, arose exactly in this way: During the civil war there came the great invention of the Monitor and a great awakening to the necessity for and the superiority of ironclads and armored vessels over the old wooden vessels. Everybody knows the history of the Merrimac and the Monitor. The United States Government required the contractors who were building the new Navy to put into their contracts the stipulation that the Government should have the right to make any changes in the contract as it should go on, at any time before its completion, and that the contractors should have the right to be reimbursed the cost.

In other words, it was as if a gentleman who had contracted with a carpenter to build him a cottage at the seashore that would cost $1,500 had gotten the contract with a reservation that he might, if he saw fit, change it into a contract to build the new proposed depot down here, or a new building of any character. It was in substance, of course, confined to what would be called naval construction, but it was an absolute obligation to do anything the Government required. That was put in because the inventors of the country were making improvements in naval construction and architecture and the great revolution in ships of war was just begun and was going on.

The Government paid, I believe, the actual cost of these changes, although in many cases hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars were imposed upon the contractor. But that not only required the addition, but it required long delay. The contractor had undertaken to do something he could do in three months or six months, and suddenly he was called upon by the Government to do something that was to take him nine months or fifteen months, or two years. In that period the cost of material and labor enormously increased.

By reason of the subtraction from the industries of this country of from half a million to a million men there was not only an increased demand and a diminished supply of labor, but the price of material went up, and the price of gold went up from 100 to 250, and at one time it nearly touched 300. So it cost the contractors twofold or threefold what they had contracted for to carry out their original contracts, and that they never had any pay for.

You will always find gentlemen out of Congress, if not in either House of Congress, whenever a contractor makes a claim against the Government, to guess and imagine that there is something very wicked, and it gets stayed off and stayed off, and after it has been delayed a few years then they say: "Oh, it is an old claim. Here is a claim twenty or fifteen or ten years old, and of course you can not say that it must be paid."

Mr. President, the first knowledge I ever had of these matters was in the Committee on Claims, which was the first committee I went on in this body in 1877. I will state the case, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, and perhaps my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will correct me if I am, because he was on that committee at the time. It was a case of a Missourian. Was Chouteau the name?

Mr. COCKRELL. Chouteau, Harrison & Vallé.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I had not a particle of interest in it or concern about it or knowledge of the people, except a desire to do justice in the matter. I made the report, if I am not mistaken. I may have got the wrong case, but I am stating in general what happened about some case.

The report was made and it met and ran the gantlet of inquiries and objections. It was a great deal harder to get those things through at that time than it is now. I believe on full discussion every Senator on both sides of the Chamber was satisfied with the absolute justice of that claim, and it went through and was paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it never has been paid.

Mr. HOAR. Well, I thought it was paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. HOAR. Then I have got the wrong claim. At any rate, it went through the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think so.

Mr. HOAR. That is enough for my purpose.

Mr. WARREN. The Chouteau claim passed the Senate and met with a veto elsewhere, because of the size of the bill of which the Chouteau claim was a part.

Mr. HOAR. It did get through the Houses, and was vetoed; but that is immaterial. I am speaking of the whole matter. The substance of it is that that claim was admitted to be just by every member of this body, as I now recollect. There have been other claims like it reported and discussed, and I have no recollection of one against which there has ever been cast a vote in this body on the merits. If there be one, I do not remember it, and I probably never knew it at the time.

There have been objections to paying these large claims by gentlemen who were managing the public expenditures and did not want to increase the showing of the total appropriations, and there have been objections started and abandoned from imperfect knowledge; but I think to refuse the payment is just as disreputable to a great and rich government, and it would be just as disreputable to a small and poor government, as it would be for me or you, Mr. Chairman, to refuse to pay the carpenter who builds our house. The fact that these men came to the aid of the Government in the time of its extremity makes the case all the stronger. A few of the claims—a good many of them, I dare say—got through singly, but some of them are still unpaid.

Then, in order that we might put an end to the discussion of these details over and over again, the matter was sent to the Selfridge board, a board composed of old naval officers of high standing and character. I can not state myself from recollection, but the Senator from Wyoming will state whether the board was unanimous in its finding.

Mr. WARREN. It was.

Mr. HOAR. It was unanimous in its finding.

Now, is it possible for the United States to make a contract? Is it possible for the United States to owe anybody a dollar honestly and fairly? And if it be possible, I will not ask the question whether under those circumstances it is possible for this Government to refuse to pay it.

Mr. DANIEL. I think I heard the Senator from Wyoming, who has charge of the bill, state that the Monitor sank the Merrimac. That statement is against all the history I have read on the subject.

Mr. WARREN. If I am mistaken I will correct it.

Mr. DANIEL. That is a mistake. The Monitor never sank the Merrimac.

Mr. WARREN. Technically, the Senator from Virginia is right, but the Monitor practically destroyed the Merrimac.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, there has been much controversy over the claims known as the Selfridge claims. I have not recently had the time and the opportunity to make a thorough examination of their history in Congress or in the departments. I will only state now what I understand to be the grounds of the objections that are now urged to them. I want it put in the RECORD, so that hereafter the Committee on Claims may investigate the correctness of these charges.

Contracts were made during the war, just as stated by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], with provision for changes and alterations in them, and changes and alterations were made. The time of completion was delayed, and the Navy Department paid what they considered a reasonable cost of the changes that were made.

In 1865, I think it was, a resolution was passed by the Senate, a single resolution only of the Senate—not a law—authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint, or authorizing the appointment of, what has since been known as the Selfridge board. That board made an examination and a report specifying the amounts that they found; and thereupon in subsequent Congresses application was made for the payment of the awards made by that board.

I can not state with accuracy the Congress in which it occurred, but in a subsequent Congress there was very full and lengthy discussion of the Selfridge board claims. The result of that discussion was the enactment of a law creating what has since been known as the Marchand board. The Marchand board made their report, and a law was enacted making appropriations to pay certain amounts to the contractors, to be received in full payment and discharge of their obligations, and the payments were accordingly made.

As a matter of course the record will show this, and the law enacted will show it. I have not had time to hunt it up and make a reference to it. I am only stating what I understand to be the objections now urged against these claims. The amount the Marchand board allowed or that was appropriated under it was much less than the amount under the Selfridge board.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is stating correctly certain of the incidents, but I think he overlooks the fact that the Selfridge board claims we are proposing to pay did not as a rule go before the Marchand board.

The Marchand board, as the Senator says, was a later board and took up the vessels that were not finished at the time the Selfridge board made their findings, so that but few of the whole number of Selfridge board claims went before the Marchand board.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some of them were before it.

Mr. WARREN. Some of them were before the Marchand board. They brought in altogether allowed claims to the amount of about two hundred and odd thousand dollars due on certain vessels. To be exact the amount was $187,475.56.

As the Senator says, there was full discussion in the House and Senate following that report. There were all kinds of propositions. Some members of the House and Senators felt that the amount of Marchand board findings even ought to be cut down. One proposition for a cut of 87½ per cent or down to an allowance of 12½ per cent was made on this floor, I think.

But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a number of claimants for whom the Marchand board found amounts due were not willing to rest their cases there, but took them to the Court of Claims, and I think in every case the judgment found was for a larger amount than the Marchand board had found. In two cases that I noted particularly, where claims were before both boards, a great deal larger sum was awarded by the court than either the Selfridge or Marchand board had accorded.

For instance, this morning, in looking over the reports, I noticed the case of the boat Manayunk, that was before both boards, where the finding was $71,569.42 by the Selfridge board and Marchand found nothing. The court awarded $91,072, an increase of nearly $20,000.

In another case, where $36,533.44 was found due, the court gave the claimant $127,077—over three times as much as the Selfridge board finding and after the Marchand board found nothing.

The Marchand board was a different and we may say a more restricted board, and followed different instructions. Instead of taking into consideration all the circumstances and computing all the expenses, including the rise of material and the rise of labor, it was to consider only what was found due the contractors under the specific terms of their contracts. Now, a contract would read, we will say, $75,000 for a piece of work. It would state that any additions made by the Navy Department should be at the same expense relatively as to labor and material.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the same ratio of cost.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. Now, these changes, such as were extraordinary and which were made from time to time, and in which the Government asked delay in order to perfect its plans, etc., carried the work along until, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, the material and labor had risen to two and three times as much, or anyway from 150 to 200 per cent higher. All that came up before the Selfridge board for its consideration. The Marchand board sat with closed doors and considered the contract and the papers alone, without taking testimony or reviewing any of the evidence as to the extra work occasioned by the extraordinary demands of the Government because of unprecedented circumstances and surroundings.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was not certain as to the particular claims that the Marchand board acted upon. I supposed they acted upon all the Selfridge board claims.

Mr. WARREN. No; only a part of them.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, in your bill you have claims—or you ought to have—that were not in the Selfridge board award?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that those are still in the bill. They are references to the Court of Claims for settlement. They are cases where the Selfridge board did not find, or where the claims escaped the attention of both boards, or where the boards found an amount unsatisfactory to the contractor.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke about the rise in the price of gold. Under the reference of these claims the question would not be open to the Court of Claims to decide whether these gentlemen should get the difference between legal-tender money and gold.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts hardly meant that. I think that the rise in gold would be represented perhaps in the rise of material and labor. I do not understand that the court takes up as a matter of fact the price of gold from day to day, but it does take up the price of commodities that go into the construction of vessels.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only wanted to say that if they were to be taken into account it would open Pandora's box, not only as to one of them, but all of them.

Mr. WARREN. That is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would involve this Government in extra appropriations for another century.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to state the ground of criticism of these claims, so that in the future the question might be carefully examined, and if they come up again that we may have an historical account of them, and that there may be no doubt about the facts in the case.

Mr. WARREN. In reply to that particular side of the controversy, there is no doubt that they will come up.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. WARREN. There is no doubt that we shall have to again consider them and that all of us have much to learn concerning these claims. While I acknowledge that what the Senator says is true, it seems to me that the real cause of the objection is that the House members acknowledge, many of them, that they do not know anything about the claims, and as they involve a large amount, the members are against them. The speeches on the other side will show that the opposition to these claims does not come principally from men who claim to have studied them and who are acquainted with all the facts. The objection comes either from the fact that they do not know about them themselves, or from misinformation gathered from irresponsible sources.

The RECORD includes speeches made in the House by members who inserted what purports to be historical material, but an examination divulges that the alleged history has been presented in another form about the Capitol in a fly-leaf publication that has been gratuitously distributed and from which members have seemed to quote. The free dodger referred to is remarkable in that it is not true in what it does say and is also remarkable in that it leaves out that which is true.

Now, as to the findings of these different boards. I can not say that there have not been two or three successive Congresses when they were not appropriated for, but I think not. I think in the more than thirty years last past nearly every Congress has appropriated something somewhere on these different boat claims, either to pay a claim directly or to send some of the claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that I think there ought to be some of these old documents reprinted. The reports of both the Selfridge board and the Marchand board ought to be reprinted, and there ought to be a reprint of any of those documents which are not accessible, because we must go by the record of what has been done. As soon as I find out which of the reports are not accessible I shall introduce a resolution to have them reprinted for the benefit of the Senate so that we may have the facts and not indulge in speculation about it.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Missouri is quite right in the matter. Following his suggestions, I will insert at this point some tables which I have prepared.

The Marchand board also considered some other claims, not finding amounts due, and upon which payments have not been made. So I do not enumerate.

It will be observed that the name of a vessel sometimes appears in one board for claim on hull and in the other board for claim on machinery. The first being finished in time went to the first board, and the balance not finished in time went to the second board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it was the intention that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] should follow the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to-day, but owing to affliction in his family he has been unable to be in the Senate to speak this afternoon. The understanding was that the opponents of the bill would be ready to go on upon Tuesday. I was in hopes that perhaps some one would be ready to go on this afternoon. The understanding was that they would be ready to go on upon Tuesday and that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Iowa would fill the day to-day. I ask the Senator from Idaho whether anyone is ready to go on. Of course I should be glad to have the time occupied to-day by debate on the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that we had made our arrangements to go on to-morrow, understanding that to-day would be occupied by the Senators from Iowa and Michigan. I have inquired and the arrangements have been perfected. All the days are taken up until the debate is closed, so far as I know, and those on this side who are to speak have arranged the time when they will speak.

Mr. HALE. This week?

Mr. DUBOIS. This week, commencing to-morrow morning. As the Senator from Massachusetts knows, it is quite difficult to arrange a programme of speakers. We have been devoting considerable time to it and have the programme arranged, with the understanding, however, that we were to commence to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it was understood that the opposition to the bill would go on upon Tuesday. I have no right to expect or to press them to go on this afternoon. As one of our speakers on our side has dropped out I will ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar.

Mr. DUBOIS. As the Senator from Massachusetts knows, I am quite anxious for an executive session, and if it will not inconvenience anyone, will it not be well for the Senate this afternoon to have an executive session?

Mr. LODGE. I will move for an executive session presently; but first I should like to call up for consideration a bill on the Calendar.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well.

GOVERNORS ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 113) authorizing the use and improvement of Governors Island, Boston Harbor.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend in line 4, after the name "Massachusetts," by striking out "through its mayor," and in line 11, after the word "by," by striking out the word "him," and inserting "the Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the name "Massachusetts," it is proposed to strike out "through its mayor," and in line 11, after the words "approved by," to strike out "him," and insert "the Secretary of War;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to permit the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, to improve and beautify Governors Island, or a portion thereof, situated in said city and belonging to the United States, in connection with mooring berths to be built adjoining said island, and to make such excavations and fillings and erect and maintain such structures as may be considered proper for the purpose; all upon plans to be previously approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the permission given pursuant to this resolution shall not pass any right or title in said island, but shall be revocable at will by the Secretary of War, and the ownership of said island shall remain entirely in the United States, and it shall be subject to such uses for military or other purposes as the Secretary of War may at any time direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

OLE STEENSLAND.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10782) granting a pension to Ole Steensland, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

A. G. FOSTER,
J. C. PRITCHARD,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MILLS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MORGAN MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION OF WINCHESTER, VA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 172) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Morgan Memorial Association of Winchester, Va., certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 9, after the name "Morgan," to insert "in such manner that their safety from unlawful removal will be assured and their return if called for by Congress;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to loan to the Morgan Memorial Association, Winchester, Va., the two 24-pounder boat howitzers, English (bronze), without carriages, relics of the Revolutionary war, now at the Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa., to be placed at the grave of Gen. Daniel Morgan in such manner that their safety from unlawful removal will be assured and their return if called for by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 19, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MCDERMOTT obtained leave of absence for two days, on account of important business.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 14046).

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair).

Mr. SHERMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday there was pending a point of order, raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], against the provision on page 62, contained in lines 15 to 19, inclusive.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy the attention of the Chair but a few minutes in stating what I have to say in reference to this point of order. Unquestionably, if we considered nothing else but the rule in this matter, the Chair would be bound to hold that this provision is in contravention of the rule that prohibits new legislation on an appropriation bill, but from time to time that rule has had numerous holes punched in it. Now, the question is as to whether the Chair will maintain the rule or whether the Chair, reasoning from analogy, will hold that this comes within the line of precedents adopted in reference to the rule heretofore. That is the question.

Now, I admit that it has been held not to be in violation of the rule to build a new battle ship on an appropriation bill. I admit, if you are going to reason in a logical way, that this provision is no more new legislation than the building of a battle ship, but we all recognize that when the House decided that it was not in contravention of this rule to put a battle ship in a naval appropriation bill, the House committed an act of parliamentary revolution. There was no reason for this. The House, merely in order to build a new Navy in this way, committed an act of revolution and punched that hole in the rule. Later the House has held that it was not in contravention of the rule to build public buildings at the Naval Academy or at West Point, and that was clearly a parliamentary revolution and a violation of the rules, but it became a precedent that has been adhered to since.

The nearest point in question to the present proposition is where the House once decided that it was in order to increase the seamen in the Navy on an appropriation bill, and I admit, Mr. Chairman, that it is very nearly in point with the proposition here to increase the number of officers in the Navy. But that was done by the House. All these innovations on the rule, Mr. Chairman, have been committed by revolutionary methods. The House has decided that these innovations should be made, that these holes should be punched in the rules. Now, I admit that the Chair can hold to a strict construction of this rule, or he may accept the precedents that have already been adopted and say that this is analogous to the precedents already made.

I know the Chair is familiar with these precedents, as familiar as I am or more so, and familiar with the rule, but my argument to the Chair in reference to this matter comes down as to whether it is wise for the Chair to take the position, for instance, that the House has heretofore held that it is not an innovation of the rule, when there is a change of law made that relates to the naval establishment on the ground that it is an extension of the naval establishment, of a work already in progress. I admit the Chair can take that position and reason from analogy, from the precedents already adopted, but what I say is this, that it will be a very dangerous precedent for the Chair to establish. Most of the innovations that have been made in reference to this rule have been made by the House itself and not by the chairman.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has a right to make a point of order as against this particular provision, but I would like to inquire if he makes it because he is opposed to the enactment of this portion of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would state to the gentleman from Kentucky that I am both opposed to this provision of the bill and also opposed to this means of legislation. Now, I will state to my friend from Kentucky that if the Chair rules this in order to increase the Navy by putting a provision in the naval bill and then establish a precedent for the future to hold that it would be in order to increase the Army by putting a provision of this kind on the Army bill, that the usual control that the House has held heretofore over an increase of the standing Army of this country or a decrease, for that matter, or over an increase of the Navy, would absolutely be gone. If the Chair holds that this provision of this bill is in order, then the committee of this House will have all the machinery, all the power of the naval appropriation bill, and that means of forcing legislation through the House to regulate the size of the standing Army in this country and of the naval establishment of this country.

And I say it will be an unsafe precedent. I say it is much safer for the country, much safer for the legislation before Congress, to hold the legislation in reference to the increase of the Army and the increase of the Navy to the old and usual method of bringing a bill in here for that purpose, with nothing else connected with it, and let it fight its own way through the House.

Mr. WHEELER. Will not the gentleman accomplish the end which he desires—that is, the registering of his protest against this character of legislation—by moving to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that if it only rested in opposition to the paragraph, that would be true; but I think the increase of the naval establishment and of the number of naval officers in this bill is not nearly as dangerous either to the country or to the orderly legislation of this House as the establishment of a precedent that you may legislate in reference to the increase of the standing Army in this country on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit me to make one statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. The country is confronted with this situation: We have not now enough junior officers properly to officer the vessels which are completed. Many of them are laid up because there are not enough junior officers, and in the course of the next three or four years, unless something is done to increase the junior-officer force of the American Navy, the majority of our vessels will have to rust at the stocks and can not go to sea.

While I realize the importance of the statement about an ill-considered and hasty increase of the Army and Navy, it does occur to me that, in view of the fact that the gentleman's Democratic colleagues on the committee, entertaining the same views as himself, have seen proper to waive those views in view of the urgent necessity for an immediate increase of the Navy, he may consent to accomplish his purpose, the registering of his protest, by moving to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me say to my colleague that I have the highest respect for my colleagues on the committee, and I always follow the committee when I can; but of course we all recognize that a committee of this House is organized for the purpose of formulating legislation, but not for the purpose of expecting that the House shall accept absolutely their decisions. The committee give their views. We are expected to follow them if we believe they are right. We certainly ought to give due consideration to the views of the members of the committee, after they have carefully considered any matter; but if we adopt the proposition that we must surrender our individual views on any subject because a committee of our colleagues have reported it to the House, then the House might as well surrender its legislative functions.

Mr. WHEELER. This provision is not without precedent, unless I am incorrectly informed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I stated to the Chair a moment ago, there is a hole punched in this rule, wherein it was once allowed to increase the number of seamen on an appropriation bill, but that is the only precedent that I know of.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman a minute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MUDD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I am frank to say that my attention had not been called to that particular decision. I understand the gentleman to admit that there has been a decision of the Chair on a point of order made, that you can increase the number of seamen in the Navy on an appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is such a decision. In the Fifty-third Congress, on February 19, 1895, there was a provision inserted in the naval appropriation bill for the increase of the seamen of the Navy. A point of order was made against the provision by Mr. Sayers, of Texas, and Mr. O'Neil, of Massachusetts, who was the chairman at that time, held that the point of order was not well taken, because it was a continuation of an existing work or improvement. I admit that has been held, but the point that I am making is not that the Chair can not reason from analogy to this point, and can not find a reason for holding this in order, but I say that the reason that this rule was adopted was to maintain the orderly legislative procedure of this House.

If you hold that a committee can insert a provision of this kind, the House must hold in the future that any member on this floor can insert a provision of this kind; that when questions involving the Army or the Navy of the United States are under consideration, or the country is excited in reference to them, whenever an Army or a naval appropriation bill comes before this House in the future, if the Chair holds this in order, any member of this House can rise in his seat and force the House, so to speak, to take action with reference to increasing or decreasing the standing Army of the country or the Navy of the country. I admit that you can reason from analogy and reach the conclusion that this may be allowed to remain in the bill; but if you hold that this is not in violation of this rule—it being clearly in violation of the strict letter of the rule—then I say that you open the gates to very dangerous legislation in the future and adopt a dangerous precedent by which to guide this House.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that I believe it is the duty of the Chairman, notwithstanding the various violations of the rule, and of all Chairmen of this House, to hold that a provision that is offered to an appropriation bill must come on all fours with the propositions heretofore held to be in order in the House, and let the House make the hole in the rules; let the House commit the parliamentary revolution, but let the Chair sustain the orderly procedure of the House under the rule.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit to the Chair that it has over and over again been held that the naval establishment is a public work and is to be considered as a whole. That establishment consists not alone of the material, not alone of the ships that we build, not alone of the navy-yards that we establish, not alone of the dry docks we construct, but of the personnel, which is composed of two great general divisions. First, the seamen, the enlisted men. Second, the officers that command those enlisted men. Now, this establishment, as I say, involves not alone the material, but this personnel. It has been held over and over again that the authorization of the construction of a new ship for the Navy is a part of this general work. It has been held that the buildings in the navy-yards are part of this work.

It was at one time held that the building of a dry dock was not a part of the work, but that decision was overruled; so that it is now the established rule that the construction of a dry dock is a part of this public work and can be authorized in an appropriation bill. It has been held that the increase of the enlisted men and boys necessary to man the ships that are built under this general work establishing the naval establishment is in order. Now, by what reasoning, I submit, can it be held that a provision in this appropriation bill authorizing an increase of the officers is contrary to the rule? As the gentleman from Alabama has correctly stated, the decision made by Chairman O'Neil held that the authorization of seamen was a continuance of this public work. And I want the chairman's attention to the fact that this decision not only carries the weight of the chairman's opinion, but that it was appealed from to the House and sustained by an overwhelming majority of 143 to 37.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be argued that this is a provision relating to the education of the officers. I want to call the Chair's attention, in connection with that, to the fact that the Naval Academy is a part of this work established for the very purpose of educating the officers; that this Academy is as much a part of the naval establishment as any ship in the Navy. We have been authorized to build it up by all provisions that have heretofore been enacted into law with reference to it, without objection to it, too. It can not be insisted that while we can build the Naval Academy, we can not provide for its use in this way.

Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances I submit that the point of order is not well taken. These decisions are all here. I want to say to my friend from Alabama that I had hoped, however, that he would see his way clear to support a provision of this kind. I want to call his attention to the fact that this legislation has been substantially enacted for the Army already in a provision which I did not favor, authorizing Senators of the United States permanently to appoint cadets.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the committee seems to be in favor of the legislation, there is no trouble in reporting a bill in the proper way and bringing it up in the House. If the legislation is needed, they have ample opportunity to report it.

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman very well understands that in appropriation bills these matters ought really to come, because they relate to the whole naval establishment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not think there ought to be any such legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. DAYTON. I submit, further, it would be a very problematical matter whether consideration could be obtained for this legislation this session under the rules of the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there is a statute fixing the number of cadets?

Mr. DAYTON. There is a statute providing for the appointment or designation of cadets by members of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But what I want to know is whether there is a statute that fixes the number?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not think so. I am not sure, however.

Mr. LOUD. The law provides for one from each district.

Mr. DAYTON. Every four years each member of Congress may recommend a cadet, and the President has the appointment of a number of cadets.

Mr. LOUD. There is one to be appointed from each district.

Mr. DAYTON. And the President of the United States has the appointment of a number of cadets——

Mr. LOUD. That is a limited number.

Mr. DAYTON. And there are cadets from foreign countries who are educated in the Academy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Each member of Congress—from each district, of course—has the right to appoint a cadet; one cadet, but that limits the number, because they are only the number of members of the House. Now, I want to enlarge the Navy, and build that up; but I am a little bit afraid about your being able to do so in the way suggested here.

Mr. DAYTON. The number of seamen was fixed by law, and it has been held that we could change that number and increase it. The number of constructors and the number of Engineer Corps have been increased.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was the number fixed or limited by law?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When was that done?

Mr. DAYTON. It has been done. This bill increases the number of seamen, and the provision has been passed without objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the law at that time limit the number?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is that decision?

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman will find it in section 488 of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents.

On February 19, 1895, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the naval appropriation bill. Mr. Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, had on the preceding day made a point of order on a provision of the bill providing that the Secretary of the Navy should be authorized to enlist "as many additional seamen as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 2,000."

The number before that time had been fixed and he was authorized to enlist not to exceed 2,000 additional. A point of order was overruled by the chairman, and his decision was sustained by the House by a vote of 147 ayes to 37 noes. I do not care to read the whole decision, but the gentleman can examine it himself. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to one or two points not yet touched upon. While I am perfectly aware that certain rulings have been made heretofore and certain things done on the naval bill, let us see what overruling the point of order in this case would lead to, in the extreme. If you can on an appropriation bill increase the number of cadets, which is specified now by statutory law, then upon an appropriation bill you could increase the number of admirals, notwithstanding the statute may prescribe that when the present admiral dies the office shall die with him. So if you can increase upon an appropriation bill—and I desire to impress particularly on the mind of the Chairman this point—if you can increase by one officer in the Navy, then you can increase the officers in the Navy unlimited. You could put upon this appropriation bill, if you please, 10 admirals, 50 vice-admirals. To be sure it is the extreme, but the House has rules to protect itself against the excitement of the times. The excitement of the times might impel the House to adopt measures on an appropriation bill where in its calm moments it would not. I hope the Chair, if he has not made up his mind, will see what overruling the point of order might lead to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not disagree with the gentleman from Alabama in his statement as to the duty of the Chair. The Chair does think that it is the duty of the Chairman to decide points of order as they appear and to disregard entirely his individual hopes and desires in reference to the subject-matter under consideration. And the present occupant of the Chair has always been so guided in deciding points of order. On more than one occasion he has been obliged to rule against his inclinations and desires. The Chair also thinks it is the duty of members of the committee and the House to sustain the Chair when they believe he is right. The Chair thinks there have been occasions when that has not been followed. [Laughter and applause.]

The ruling in reference to the construction of a battle ship is one which the present occupant of the chair has heretofore followed, although he did not originally make it, and is frank to say that, although he has great respect and regard for the gentleman who did make it, he doubts if he had been in the chair when the question arose if he would have made it. He has never been in sympathy with it. But that was a provision to increase the number of battle ships when the number was not specifically defined by statute. Likewise, so far as the Chair has been able to ascertain from a hurried reading and inspection of the statutes, there was no specific provision as to the number of seamen. Both of these questions, then, were decided upon the broader ground whether or not it was increasing the general naval establishment.

In the case now presented there is a statute, section 1513, which reads:

There shall be allowed at said Academy one cadet midshipman for every Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, one for the District of Columbia, and ten appointed annually at large.

There is a specific, general statutory provision as to the number of cadets at the Naval Academy. The amendment to which the gentleman from Alabama has raised the point of order changes the number of cadets and changes existing law, which is clearly and unequivocally against the provision of the rule, section 2 of Rule XXI, which provides: "Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order on any general appropriation bill." The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized on a new point of order as to other lines on this same proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each Senator and each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, according to the apportionment fixed by the act approved January 16, 1901, shall nominate 1 cadet and a sufficient number of alternates, and 24 cadets shall be appointed at large by the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the same point of order against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Of the whole number of additional cadets hereby authorized 125 shall be appointed annually during the four years next succeeding the passage of this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the remainder of page 63, together with the first two lines of page 64, might as well go out. It all has reference to the appointment of these cadets. I ask unanimous consent that we pass on and read the paragraph, beginning on page 64.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] asks unanimous consent to strike from the bill the balance of page 63 and the first two lines on page 64. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAYTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 12, page 62, insert the following:
"The title of naval cadet is hereby changed to midshipman."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why does the gentleman want to change that title?

Mr. DAYTON. Simply because the title "midshipman" was formerly used, and when it was changed a number of years ago to "naval cadet" the change was made, I think, without consideration. This is simply a proposition to recur to the old title, which is historical. This proposition has been recommended by the President, has been asked for by practically all of the officers of the Navy, and by the Department. This motion will simply restore the old nomenclature.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is this a committee amendment?

Mr. DAYTON. It is agreed to by the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By all the committee?

Mr. DAYTON. All the members of the committee have agreed to it, so far as I know. I called the attention of many of them to it. I think the committee intended to agree to the amendment. It was discussed at one time in the committee, but afterwards, I believe, overlooked.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. DAYTON was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That sections 8 and 9 of the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and the Marine Corps of the United States," are hereby repealed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, sections 8 and 9 of the act of March 3, 1899, provide first for the voluntary and next for the enforced retirement of certain officers of the Navy. Those sections were originally introduced in order to get rid of a superfluity of those officers. During the civil war a very large number of officers were engaged, and subsequently, because of the fact that the Navy was diminished in size, there was an excess of officers. Consequently, sections 8 and 9, referred to in the amendment, provided for the retirement of certain officers. It was found that young men entering the Navy as officers grew old before ever reaching the period when they could command.

This resulted from the congested condition of the Navy. It is the universal opinion that men should be intrusted with commands while they are yet young, while they are in the full vigor of physical and mental activity. Because of the congested condition of the Navy young officers, as I have said, became old before they could attain the position even of commander. Consequently sections 8 and 9 were enacted for the purpose of overcoming this congested condition. Section 8 provides for the voluntary retirement of officers; section 9 for their enforced retirement. Those sections are as follows:

SEC. 8. Officers of the line in the grades of captain, commander, and lieutenant-commander may, by official application to the Secretary of the Navy, have their names placed on a list which shall be known as the list of "Applicants for voluntary retirement," and when at the end of any fiscal year the average vacancies for the fiscal years subsequent to the passage of this act, above the grade of commander, have been less than 13; above the grade of lieutenant-commander, less than 20; above the grade of lieutenant, less than 29; and above the grade of lieutenant, junior grade, less than 40, the President may, in the order of the rank of the applicants, place a sufficient number on the retired list, with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the next higher grade, to cause the aforesaid vacancies for the fiscal year then being considered.

SEC. 9. That should it be found at the end of any fiscal year that the retirements pursuant to the provisions of law now in force, the voluntary retirements provided for in this act, and casualties are not sufficient to cause the average vacancies enumerated in section 8 of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall, on or about the 1st day of June, convene a board of not less than three nor more than five rear-admirals, and shall place at its disposal the service and medical records on file in the Navy Department of all the officers in the grades of captain, commander, lieutenant-commander, and lieutenant. The board shall then select, as soon as practicable after the 1st day of July, a sufficient number of officers from the before-mentioned grades as constituted on the 30th day of June of that year, to cause the average vacancies enumerated in section 8 of this act.

Each member of said board shall swear, or affirm, that he will, without prejudice or partiality, and having in view solely the special fitness of officers and the efficiency of the naval service, perform the duties imposed upon him by this act. Its finding, which shall be in writing, signed by all the members, a majority governing, shall be transmitted to the President, who shall thereupon, by order, make the transfers of such officers to the retired list as are selected by the board: Provided, That not more than 5 captains, 4 commanders, 4 lieutenant-commanders, and 2 lieutenants are so retired in any one year. The promotions to fill the vacancies thus created shall date from the 13th day of June of the current year: And provided further, That any officer retired under the provisions of this section shall be retired with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the next higher grade.

Now, the condition which caused the enactment of those sections has passed away. Instead of having too many officers, we have not enough. It is desirable that these provisions of law, which practically put a premium on the retirement of officers at an age when they should be serving in the Navy instead of seeking retirement, should be repealed.

This measure was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, both in his report and in the hearings before the committee, as well as on divers other occasions. I read from the hearings before the committee:

Mr. DAYTON. Does that apply to the civil war veterans?

Secretary LONG. No, sir. Clause No. 7 provides for voluntary retirement. If a man wants to get out, you give him a premium to go, and clause No. 8 refers to compulsory retirement, where if a man is so broken down that he can not do the work, you give him a premium for his inefficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you think that we ought to repeal those clauses?

Secretary LONG. Yes, sir.

I read the following from the report of the late Secretary of the Navy:

PROPOSED MODIFICATION OF LAWS RELATING TO THE PERSONNEL.

Referring to the act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, approved March 2, 1899, I call your attention to sections 8 and 9, and recommend that the provision that officers retired under these sections shall be given the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the next higher grade be so far modified that the retirement will be with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the grade held at the time of retirement. This modification is especially desirable in section 8, where the retirement is voluntary.

Section 8 offers a valuable and much-needed officer a premium to go on the retired list at the very time when the number of officers is far short of the number required by the needs of the service and when Congress is called upon for more. Section 9, on the other hand, gives a premium to the same end to an officer whose services are no longer of value, and who receives this premium when other officers equally deserving are retired with no such benefit. I never favored these sections.

Now, at a time when we are seeking to introduce new officers into the Navy; when there is no longer a congested condition; when we have not enough officers to command the ships we already have, saying nothing of new ships yet to be constructed, it occurs to me that this recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy should be complied with; and we ought to do away with this premium that the present law offers to officers to retire from the Navy at the very time when they should be most active in the service of their country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has this question been considered in the Naval Committee?

Mr. WATSON. Well, I do not think it has been. I think I can answer that safely. If it was considered, it was at some meeting where I was not present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not acted on or recommended by the committee?

Mr. WATSON. I see the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] is rising, and perhaps he can answer that question.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state that it is done for the purpose of preventing those who are able to discharge their duties as naval officers taking advantage of this provision, which puts a premium on their retirement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision provides that if a man retires he retires to the next highest rank?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And if this provision be repealed, then he will retire under the law as it then exists. Will they have the same advantages?

Mr. WATSON. No, sir; this does not at all interfere with existing general law on the subject of retirement. It still obtains in all cases, of course. I want to say, further, to the gentleman that this simply restores the old law, that is all; but it does not enable officers to be retired at a grade higher than that held at the expiration of their terms of service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman if, under the general law, when a man is retired by operation of it, he retires to a rank higher than the rank he holds in the Navy?

Mr. WATSON. Not under the general Navy law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, those men who have been retired under this provision have been specially favored, have they not?

Mr. WATSON. But suppose it be wrong, would it justify the continuance of that wrong, simply because others have been favored in that respect? I do not believe, for one, that any officer should be retired, unless the circumstances are very peculiar, at a grade higher than that in which he is serving at the time of his retirement. Why should he be retired at a grade higher? He serves in the Navy for all these years; he has the pay of the Government for all these years, and he reaches a certain rank at the end of his service, and when he retires, according to my opinion, he ought to be content to retire at the grade in which he is serving at the time of his retirement. I have never been an advocate of retiring at a grade higher in either the Army or the Navy.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. I fully agree with the statements made by the gentleman, and I heartily approve of all that he has said in that connection, but I would like to ask him to state further and more explicitly what effect on that part of the law the repeal of this section will have.

Mr. WATSON. It simply prevents its being done in the future; that is all.

Mr. HULL. It does not prevent those who served in the civil war getting a grade higher.

Mr. WATSON. No; that is separate proposition. It does not affect the civil-war veterans.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then I wish to say on the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, I think it is right, and ought to be repealed. I would have preferred to have had a chance to examine it a little more fully, however.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think there is any doubt about this being new legislation and the point of order lying against the proposition, but in view of the fact that we need all the officers we can get and the legislation sought by the gentleman from Indiana merely seeks to hold serviceable officers in line and not to increase any governmental expenditures but to require men already employed by the Government to do their duty, I shall not insist on the point of order, as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Ought not this amendment to be still further amended so as to include section 10 of that act? That is the section that authorizes the retirement in the grade next above the one in which the officer is serving. I think that is an improper provision of law.

Mr. WATSON. Section 10 has reference to civil war veterans. It is not aimed to apply to them. We leave that, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, simply because that is existing law with regard to the Army.

Mr. HULL. O, no; that is not. We are trying to get it that way, but have not been able to succeed.

Mr. WATSON. I understood that was the law with reference to the Army. I will state to the gentleman that is the reason I permitted that section to remain in.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand the presence of that section is being urged before the Committee on Military Affairs on the part of a large number of officers of the Army, that they should have the same privilege. If we repeal this section now, which, in my judgment, never ought to have been enacted, we take away that argument and relieve my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, from wrestling with that last proposition.

Mr. WATSON. I am very anxious to relieve the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment to insert after the word "nine" the words "and ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "nine" in the amendment insert the words "and ten."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS—MARINE CORPS.

Barracks and quarters, Marine Corps: Construction of a fireproof marine barracks, navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., and necessary sewerage and grading, $100,000; construction of a veranda on enlisted men's quarters, navy-yard, Pensacola, Fla., $3,500; installation of an electric lighting plant, marine barracks, navy-yard, New York, N. Y., $3,500; installation of electric lights, marine barracks, navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., $1,000; construction of a marine barracks, naval training station, San Francisco, Cal., $30,000; officers' quarters, Sitka, Alaska, erection of officers' quarters at Sitka, Alaska, $2,500, and the unexpended appropriations of $2,500 authorized in act of June 10, 1896, and $1,000 authorized in act of June 7, 1900, respectively, are hereby reappropriated for the erection of officers' quarters at Sitka, Alaska, $2,500; for the erection of light frame buildings for the accommodation and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps stationed on the island of Culebra, Porto Rico, $5,000; in all, public works under Marine Corps, $145,500.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD a statement showing the numbers on shore duty. So many statements were made here the other day relative to the number of officers on shore duty that I think it is only just to the Navy that the exact statement should be published. This is an official statement which has just come in a few moments ago.

[a] Not seagoing officers. Total, 67.

[b] This includes line officers and staff officers of lower grades (not seagoing) temporarily ranking as rear-admirals while chiefs of bureaus.

H. C. TAYLOR,
Chief of Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. WHEELER. Who prepared it?

Mr. FOSS. It was prepared by the Bureau of Navigation. The other day the statement was made that there was a large number of officers at the Naval Academy. I think the number 58 was mentioned. Now, this statement gives 56, but it includes in that number 13 warrant officers, who are not graduates of the Naval Academy and are not commissioned officers. It also includes 1 civil engineer, and civil engineers do not go to sea. It also includes 5 naval constructors, and naval constructors do not go to sea; and also 4 professors of mathematics.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there, please?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Why are there five naval constructors at Annapolis, and what are they doing?

Mr. FOSS. I am mistaken about constructors being there.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, I remember very distinctly that the Chief of the Bureau of Construction stated before the committee that he was very much in need of constructors.

Mr. FOSS. Yes. So that from this number of 56 should be deducted the 13 warrant officers, 1 civil engineer, and 4 professors of mathematics; in all, 18 officers. According to this statement there would be 38 commissioned line officers at the Naval Academy, instead of 58, as was stated here on the floor the other day.

Now, I may say upon this general subject of the duties of the naval officers that the committee believe the field for the Navy is out on the sea. They are in thorough sympathy with the sentiment of the House relative to doing everything possible to keep the naval officers, so to speak, upon the sea. But this must be said in defense of naval officers: Away back in 1882, before we started in to build up the present Navy, we had nearly as many officers as we have to-day. We had at that time, however, only 32 cruising vessels. The largest was the Tennessee, about one-third as large in tonnage as the great battle ships which we propose to authorize in this bill. By reason of the fact that we had few vessels the naval officers were for the most part on the shore; but as we have built ships year after year the naval officers have gradually gone from the shore to the sea. But you can not charge naval officers with being on shore for the last twenty years because they willed it. The American Congress is responsible in some measure, because they did not give these officers ships to officer. So I think this statement ought to be made in justice to the naval officers.

Now, the whole question of duty as to the naval officer is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. I read from the law of the Navy and the Marine Corps. On March 3, 1883, this act was passed:

Hereafter no officer of the Navy shall be employed on any shore duty except in cases especially provided by law, unless the Secretary of the Navy shall determine that the employment of an officer on such duty is required by the public interest, and he shall so state in the order of employment, and also the duration of such service, beyond which time it shall not continue.

So this whole matter of whether the officers shall go to sea or not is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. He is the man whom we should hold responsible for what is done under this law.

Now, I have inserted here in my report a statement received from the Navy Department showing that of 993 line officers—our present number, including the 124 cadets, who really are not line officers to-day, because they have not received their commissions—of that number 709 are performing sea duty or doing duty beyond seas——

Mr. WHEELER. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. FOSS. And 272 are performing shore duty.

Mr. WHEELER. What do you mean by out on sea?

Mr. FOSS. Out on ships.

Mr. WHEELER. That includes officers on duty at the various navy-yards?

Mr. FOSS. No; out on board vessels and beyond the seas.

Now, you will see from this statement that this is a great improvement from the condition that existed five, ten, or fifteen years ago; and it is due entirely to the policy of the American Congress in building up the Navy and furnishing ships for those officers to officer and command.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. Does the statement the gentleman has there show how many officers are in the navy-yards and how many of them are at the private shipbuilding yards?

Mr. FOSS. This statement will show the number of officers at the Navy Department and the Naval Academy, at the Norfolk Navy-Yard, Port Royal station, Key West yard, Pensacola yard, San Francisco station, Mare Island yard, Puget Sound yard, Portsmouth Navy-Yard, Boston Navy-Yard, the War College, New York Navy-Yard, League Island Navy-Yard, Washington Navy-Yard, etc.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand there are quite a number of officers at these great shipbuilding plants which have contracts for building battle ships and cruisers. I want to know if the gentleman's statement shows the number of officers at those places?

Mr. FOSS. Not altogether. It will show naval constructors. But they are not officers who go to sea. This is a statement of the officers who go to sea.

Mr. RIXEY. Constructors are officers of the Navy, as I understand.

Mr. FOSS. They are officers, but not seagoing officers.

Mr. RIXEY. Have you a statement showing how many constructors there are at those yards?

Mr. FOSS. I have no statement upon that.

Mr. VANDIVER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question in that connection. These constructors that you speak of are naval officers, are they not?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. VANDIVER. And graduates of the Naval Academy?

Mr. FOSS. I was addressing myself to the number of officers at sea, doing sea duty, and the number on shore.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am very glad to have that statement published.

Mr. FOSS. Of course, the gentleman understands that there are a number of officers in the Navy, staff officers, who do not go to sea. Naval constructors do not go to sea.

Mr. VANDIVER. Why not?

Mr. FOSS. Because they have to do with the construction of ships on shore.

Mr. VANDIVER. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will pardon the Chair a moment. The gentleman arose to ask unanimous consent. The Chair was waiting for him to finish his request, but it has developed into a discussion, and if continued it will have to be by unanimous consent. Shall the Chair ask unanimous consent for the gentleman to continue?

Mr. FOSS. I ask that my time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that his time be extended five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VANDIVER. I was not disputing any point the gentleman makes, but I want him to be a little more explicit in the information that he gives to the House as to those officers who do not go to sea, and why?

Mr. FOSS. Well, now, I will take, for instance, medical directors. They are not seagoing officers. Pay directors, they are not seagoing officers.

Mr. VANDIVER. But they are not graduates of the Naval Academy.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no.

Mr. VANDIVER. But constructors are.

Mr. FOSS. Yes. For instance, take pay directors. They are not seagoing officers. The professors of mathematics, they are not seagoing officers; naval constructors, they are not seagoing officers; civil engineers, they are not seagoing officers. So when you come to make up a statement of the number of men in the Navy who should go to sea——

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, of course, I can understand why civil engineers should not be included in that list and why the naval physicians or doctors should not be included, but I would like the gentleman to explain more fully why these officers who are not might not be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman if the engineer corps are not line officers?

Mr. FOSS. They are, under the amalgamation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Many of these officers are assigned to inspect the construction of the engineering portion of the vessels. Does your statement show the number of such officers detailed to that work?

Mr. FOSS. At what yard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Say the Bath Iron Works, Newport News Shipbuilding Yard, the Union Iron Works, the Moran Brothers, Puget Sound, and any number of them.

Mr. FOSS. No; it does not state that.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to have the gentleman secure that information and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSS. I will ask for it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSS. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to know how many of these naval officers there are and how many are seagoing naval officers. What is the total number of officers, and then what is the total number of seagoing officers?

Mr. FOSS. All of the line officers are seagoing officers, and there are 993 of them. Of that number 709 are at sea or doing duty beyond the sea.

Mr. VANDIVER. The statement you have relates only to the 993 who are in the line?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; only as to the line.

Mr. VANDIVER. It does not include the staff officers?

Mr. FOSS. Not the number I have just given now. Take, for instance, the Medical Corps; there are 190 in all, and from this statement here there are 12 inspectors, 15 surgeons, and 24 past assistant and assistant surgeons on shore duty; that is to say, there are 51 in the Medical Corps out of the 190 in all who are on shore duty. Gentlemen will understand that in the different navy-yards——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There are 139 of the Medical Corps that are seagoing.

Mr. FOSS. Doing sea duty to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And are included in the 993?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; those are line officers. Now, I am talking about the staff officers. I have given you the condition as to the Medical Corps; that is to say, 51 out of 190 are on shore at the present time. The gentleman understands that at the different navy-yards we have naval hospitals to look out for the health of the men.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that.

Mr. FOSS. Now, take the Pay Corps, for instance, which is another staff corps; we have in the Pay Corps 136 officers, and 40 of them are on shore. We have 12 professors of mathematics, and they are on shore. Their business does not take them to sea. We have 24 chaplains, and 4 of them are on shore. We have 41 naval constructors, not seagoing officers, and they are on shore; 21 naval constructors and 20 assistant constructors, making 41 in all who are on shore.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's time being extended five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. We have 21 civil engineers, and they are shore officers.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. FOSS. Very well.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Is it not a fact that under the operation of the personnel law officers of the Engineer Corps become line officers, and such of them who rank as or above commander shall perform shore duty only, and hence can not be included in the list of seagoing officers?

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman state that that was in the personnel law?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. It is under section 5 of that act.

Mr. FOSS. I do not recall whether it is in the personnel law or not.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. My point is, therefore, that these officers, although of the line, should not be considered or regarded as seagoing officers on shore duty.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have concluded all of the staff officers in the Navy, and below that come chief boatswains, the chief gunners, the carpenters, the sailmakers, and the warrant machinists and pharmacists. I have included in my explanation all of the commissioned officers of the line and all the staff. Gentlemen will, therefore, see that the Navy is in good condition in reference to this matter.

Mr. MANN. I wish to ask the gentleman, in connection with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, whether the personnel bill operated to increase the number of officers who were on shore?

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman ask me the question or does he ask it of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. MANN. Either one who can give the information.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Louisiana to say that under the personnel bill the operation of it was to increase the number of officers designated for shore duty; that that was one of the effects of the personnel bill.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. No; such was not the effect. But the engineer officers thus referred to as being limited to shore duty replaced junior officers more eligible for sea service, who would otherwise have been required for shore duty in connection with engineering duties. I would add, however, that a large number of this class have been retired since that time. The law has been in operation for three years.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean by that that the officers designated for shore duty would without the personnel bill have been designated for sea duty?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. No; I do not mean that specifically. Engineer officers ranking as commander and above did not usually go to sea.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the operation of the personnel bill increased the number of officers on shore.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. No; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement prepared by the Navy Department.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to occupy a moment by unanimous consent. On page 58 and several other pages of the bill the "Naval station, Puget Sound," is referred to. On one page this language was corrected so as to read "Navy-yard, Puget Sound." I ask unanimous consent that a similar correction be made wherever that phrase occurs in the bill.

Mr. DAYTON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent that wherever the words "Naval station, Puget Sound," are used throughout the bill they be corrected so as to read "Navy-yard, Puget Sound."

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was amended accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract, except as herein otherwise provided, two first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of about 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost when built by contract, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class armored cruisers of about 14,500 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful armament for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, when built by contract, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,659,000 each; two gunboats of about 1,000 tons trial displacement, to cost, when built by contract, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $382,000 each; and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels so contracted for shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery, and not more than two of said battle ships and armored cruisers and not more than one of said gunboats herein provided for shall be built by one contracting party; and in the construction of all said vessels all the provisions of the act of June 7, 1900, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes," shall be observed and followed; and subject to the provisions hereinafter made not more than one of said battle ships and not more than one of said armored cruisers and not more than one of said gunboats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or in the waters connecting therewith: Provided, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President from the biddings for such contracts when the same are opened and examined by him that said vessels or any of them can not be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid for the other vessels provided for in this act, he shall authorize the construction of said vessels, or any of them, elsewhere in the United States, subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided.

Mr. BALL of Texas. I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph just read——

Mr. MUDD. I wish to reserve a point of order upon all that part of this paragraph from and including line 14, on page 73, down to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. BALL of Texas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "delivery" in line 10, page 73, strike out the three following lines:

"And not more than two of said battle ships and armored cruisers, and not more than one of said gunboats, herein provided for, shall be built by one contracting party."

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to strike out the limitation as to the number of battle ships, cruisers, and gunboats that may be built at any single yard. I understand the language which I propose to strike out has been carried in the naval appropriations bills for some years past, and I have been told, upon inquiry, that this is the usuall anguage in such appropriations. If that be true, it is a custom that would be "more honored in the breach than in the observance." Clearly the effect, if not the object, of this limitation is to prevent the Government from having the benefit of full, fair, and free competition in the bids for the construction of these vessels. As I understand, there are some three shipyards in the United States that are capable of constructing battle ships. The effect of this provision, as carried in these bills heretofore, has been to prevent the Government from having the benefit of unrestricted competition.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether he thinks it wise to strike out simply this provision. Why not strike out all the balance of the section?

Mr. BALL of Texas. I think it would be very well to do that; but what I am after now is this particular provision.

Mr. DAYTON. I simply call the gentleman's attention to the fact that all these provisions are limitations.

Mr. BALL of Texas. This is the particular point to which I object and to which, with the permission of the gentleman from West Virginia, I will address my remarks. I understand that business men pursue a different course from the one indicated in this paragraph of the bill. When Mr. Rockefeller was proposing to have constructed 12 large vessels for the lake trade, he advertised for bids for only 2. There were at that time six shipyards upon the Great Lakes capable of constructing vessels of large tonnage such as he wanted.

As I have said, he advertised for bids for only two of these vessels, and the consequence was that the agents of all these six shipyards came down to him, offering him the advantage of their lowest figures for the construction of the vessels. After they had put in their bids he retired to his office for a few minutes, and then coming back he told the agents of all these shipyards that their bids were reasonable, and therefore he would accept them all. He knew that if he advertised for the construction of 12 ships—the capacity of those shipyards being 12 only—the proprietors would get together and make such a price to him as they chose.

Now, I say the effect of such limitations—I do not charge any such purpose upon the part of the Naval Appropriations Committee—is to play into the hands of the shipbuilders and prevent the Government from getting the benefit of fair, unrestricted competition, to which it is entitled.

It may be said that a provision of this kind is necessary to secure expeditious delivery of the vessels. But there is in the paragraph just preceding that to which the amendment applies a provision allowing the Secretary of the Navy a discretion in this matter, so that he is not required to give the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, but is authorized in making the awards of the contracts to take into consideration the best result and the most expeditious delivery. So that if any one shipyard should overbid its capacity it would be within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to refuse to award them the contract, having his protection in this provision; and we well know that in the case of the Secretary of War, as recently disclosed, the only way not to get a contract was to make a bid for less than anybody else was willing to do the work for, as in the case of the contracts for disappearing guns.

In nearly every instance those contracts were awarded, not to the lowest bidder, but always to those who bid a higher figure than that of the lowest bidders. I do not think there should be any objection on the part of the Naval Affairs Committee to the striking out of this limitation in view of the fact that the clause immediately preceding gives the Secretary of the Treasury all the discretion that is necessary to protect him against irresponsible bidders.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BALL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I do not know that I have any special objection to the amendment, but I rise merely for the purpose of correcting a statement of the gentleman. Does he not know that we have some ten or twelve or perhaps more shipyards in this country, private yards, that are capable or claim to be capable of building Government vessels of the largest size?

Mr. BALL of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio perfectly well understands there is no such number of shipyards in this country that are really capable of building a battle ship.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I think there are.

Mr. BALL of Texas. And that very few of them have ever been able to give a satisfactory bid to the Government. Now, there can be no harm in striking out this limitation. It is nonsensical, it is unbusinesslike, it ought never to have been inserted, and it ought to go out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the objectionable language?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Lines 11, 12, and 13 on page 73.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is reason for the position taken by the gentleman from Texas; but if we are going to do this thing, I think his motion ought to extend from line 11 to the end of the section. That removes all these provisions. I want to say, in justice to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that they, in making this language, followed the provisions that have been maintained for a number of years in the authorization of the construction of naval vessels. However, it seems to me that the conditions that justified those provisions originally have passed away. We have now a very large number of private yards that are capable of entering into competition for these vessels, a much larger number of yards than we have vessels to construct, and it is next to an impossibility for there to be any combination among those yards for the small number of vessels which we authorize. In the next place, I want to call attention to the fact that this provision in regard to building ships on the Pacific coast grew out of the desire on the part of Congress to build up the shipbuilding yards on the Pacific coast.

Mr. COOMBS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DAYTON. In a moment. It was insisted that material was higher there than it was in the East, but the experience of the last letting has shown that the shipyards on the Pacific coast have not only been able to compete under the 4 per cent advantage that the law has heretofore given them, but they were able to enter into open competition with the yards on the Eastern coast and actually got a large portion, a large number of vessels to build, on a dead level competition with the Eastern yards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What do you mean by "Eastern yards?"

Mr. DAYTON. I mean those on the Eastern coast.

Mr. METCALF. Will the gentleman please cite some instance where the Pacific coast shipbuilding concerns have received contracts in competition against Eastern shipbuilding concerns?

Mr. DAYTON. I mean to say that the last bill provided for a certain number of these ships to be built on the Pacific coast; that the two construction yards—the Union Iron Works and Moran Brothers—entered into competition and got a number more of these vessels than the bill provided the Pacific coast should have, and they got them by open competition with the others.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to suggest with reference to Moran Brothers that the people of Seattle raised for them $100,000 in order to have their bid accepted. They thought that with the competition they had they could not do it without that, and the people of Seattle raised a hundred thousand dollars to help them do it.

Mr. DAYTON. That may be; I do not know anything about that, but I want to say that if this section is to be amended at all these provisions ought to go out. There have been labor troubles on the Pacific coast during the last year that have retarded the construction of the vessels there to such an extent that it seems to me they have all the work that they can possibly do, and it is unnecessary to provide here that one of each of these classes of vessels shall be built on the Pacific coast. They have more than their share, in my deliberate judgment, now, under former conditions, and while I do not want to make an amendment, I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] that he include in his motion the striking out of the whole of the section from and after line 10.

Mr. BALL of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to include that in my amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. Subject, of course, to the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it would be well to dispose of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to say that you could not cover the balance of the section on the motion to strike out while the point of order was pending against it. If the gentleman desires to withdraw his point of order, of course it could then be voted on.

Mr. MUDD. I will reserve the point of order in order that I may renew it, or consider it pending, in case the motion to strike out should be made. I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. METCALF. Before the point of order is considered, I should like to be heard on the subject of shipbuilding on the Pacific Coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is again raised, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], who raised the point of order, desires to discuss it.

Mr. MUDD. If it is the desire of the gentleman from California [Mr. METCALF], I will reserve the point of order until the gentleman from California has made his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. METCALF. I do not. The gentleman stated that he wished to reserve his point of order until after I have said something in regard to the question of shipbuilding on the Pacific coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order. The gentleman from California [Mr. METCALF] is recognized.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Chairman, if you want to prevent the building of ships on the Pacific coast, then strike out this provision giving to the shipbuilders of the Pacific coast 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bids. This provision has been in every naval appropriation bill for a number of years, and I presume it was only inserted after the most careful examination and investigation of the conditions existing on the Pacific coast. The cost of living on the Pacific coast in some places is greater than on the Atlantic coast or in the Middle States. Coal for manufacturing enterprises costs on the Pacific coast at least $8 a ton. Skilled labor, and especially the labor of skilled machinists, costs from a dollar to a dollar and forty cents a day more on the Pacific coast than in the Eastern or Middle States' shipyards. In addition to these increased items of cost, nearly all the material used in the construction of ships on the Pacific coast is purchased in the Eastern and Middle States and sent 3,000 miles across the continent to Seattle and San Francisco.

The Olympia, Admiral Dewey's flagship at the battle of Manila Bay, and the Oregon, with a record unparalleled by any ship in any of the navies of the world, was built by the Union Iron Works of San Francisco. The battle ship Wisconsin was built by the same company, and the battle ship Ohio and the cruising battle ship California are now in process of construction there.

If you want to encourage the building of ships like these for the American Navy, if you want to protect a great California industry, then I ask you to vote down this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks made on Saturday by two of the distinguished gentlemen from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. FOSS], relative to Mare Island Navy-Yard, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks some recent data as to the depth of water at Mare Island Navy-Yard.

The data are as follows:

On January 18, 1900, the U. S. S. Scindia left Mare Island Navy-Yard for San Francisco under instructions from the commandant of the yard to make soundings for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of water. The soundings were made, and the least depth of water found was 5½ fathoms. In order to authoritatively settle the question I wrote the commandant of Mare Island Navy-Yard, Admiral Miller, and received from him the following letter:

NAVY-YARD, MARE ISLAND, CAL., April 14, 1902.

SIR: In compliance with your request for a statement showing the depth of water in the channel and along the quay wall, Mare Island Navy-Yard at low and high tides, also statement showing the depth of water at the lowest and highest tides during the year, I have the honor to report as follows:

From survey made last January depth in channel varies as follows: Thirty to 35 feet from steam engineering building to Independence; 22 to 30 feet to South Vallejo Railroad wharf; 30 to 48 feet to outer bar, and 25 feet over bar.

From survey made to-day depths along quay wall as follows: Out 20 feet depth of 20 feet; out 75 feet depth of 25 feet; out 150 feet depth of 30 feet.

Above depths all referred to mean low tide. Highest tides 8½ feet above mean low tide. Lowest tides 1½ feet below mean low tide.

Very respectfully,

H. R. STANFORD,
Civil Engineer, U. S. N.

The COMMANDANT,
Navy-Yard, Mare Island, Cal.

[Indorsement.]

NAVY-YARD, MARE ISLAND, April 14, 1902.

Respectfully forwarded. The depths given will all be increased to 30 feet mean low water by dredging this summer, for which money has been appropriated. If rivers and harbor would once clean out the straits we would not have to dredge for several years.

MERRILL MILLER,
Rear-Admiral, Commandant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. METCALF. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You said you referred to the matter in your speech the other day, but I am unable to find the RECORD containing your speech. The question is this: It seems that this chamber of commerce over in your State somewhere—I forget the name of it——

Mr. METCALF. Vallejo.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). Of the Monterey—and the Monadnock, which was built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, was built cheaper than the Monterey, a sister ship. Now, that has been disputed. Do you know what the facts are?

Mr. METCALF. I made a statement in regard to that in my remarks on Wednesday, and since then I have ascertained that there never was any act of Congress authorizing the construction of the Monadnock. It was authorized by the Bureau of Navigation. The keel, as I remember, was laid some time in 1875. The old Monadnock was sold, and the purchaser of the old Monadnock was given permission to use a portion of the material for the construction of the new Monadnock; but for some reason he abandoned his contract, and the monitor remained exposed to wind and weather for probably eleven years without any work being done upon it. Congress then, by the act of 1886, authorized the completion of the Monadnock, which was completed at Mare Island Navy-Yard. The plans were changed. The hull was remodeled; and it practically cost more to remodel the old hull than to construct the new one. Notwithstanding that, I say the Monadnock was built for less than the Monterey.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that the officers in charge of the Mare Island Navy-Yard contend that they can build a battle ship as cheap as the private manufacturing establishments.

Mr. METCALF. I do not think there is any mistake about that. They have competed against private shipbuilding concerns on the Pacific coast. When the Logan was repaired they repaired it at $33,000 less than was bid by the lowest bidder.

Mr. DAYTON. Are you aware of the fact that 11 vessels are already being constructed for the United States on the Pacific coast?

Mr. METCALF. I am.

Mr. DAYTON. And that is a long way over the proportion provided by the bills heretofore authorized.

Mr. METCALF. I am not responsible for the letting of these contracts, but I suppose that the Navy Department came to the conclusion that they could build them better on the Pacific coast than at any other place, or they would not have awarded the contracts.

Mr. DAYTON. Have there not been spread all over this country statements to the effect that the cheapest vessels in the world can be built in California?

Mr. METCALF. I am not responsible for the statements that have been made, but I expect it is true.

Mr. DAYTON. If that is true, there is no use in keeping this provision in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Respectfully, I want to dissent from one statement the gentleman made, namely, that the cost of living is higher on the Pacific coast than it is on the Atlantic coast. My information is that, if anything, it is lower.

Mr. METCALF. I am speaking from practical experience.

Mr. MANN. Of one coast.

Mr. METCALF. On the Pacific coast.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the markets.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order, and desire to discuss it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to discuss the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will first be disposed of.

Mr. MUDD. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, is to all of the paragraph under the head of "Increase of the Navy" from and including line 14, page 73, down to and including line 8, page 74. The purpose of it is clear, Mr. Chairman. This portion of the bill contains a provision, in the first place, involving a renewal for the purposes of this act of the provisions of the act of Congress "making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901." I suppose it is restricted to the enactment of the terms and provisions of that act relating to the increase of the Navy. It relates, furthermore, to the subject of the number of battle ships which may be built in any one navy-yard, and limits and prescribes that number. It furthermore prescribes what battle ships or other vessels, one or more, as the case may be, must be built on the Pacific coast.

Now, all of these provisions, Mr. Chairman, to my mind, are clearly new legislation, inasmuch as they undertake to legislate anew as to this subject-matter and make legislative provisions that have no existence at law. I understand the decision has often been made that new legislation comes within the prohibition of the rule which declares against a change of existing law upon an appropriation bill. There has been a decision of that kind made by the present occupant of the chair, if I recollect aright, upon a paragraph similar to this, which we find set forth on page 2160 of the RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, which I will send to the Chair in a moment. The point of order was made by Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, following one made by Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, exactly similar in nature to that in this section against language therein, which I quote:

And not more than two of said battle ships, and not more than two of said armored cruisers, and not more than two of said protected cruisers shall be built in one yard or by one contracting party.

There is a similar provision, with an immaterial variance as to number and character of ships, in the paragraph against which I make this point of order.

Mr. HOPKINS, as to the obnoxious language of the paragraph then objected to, stated:

I claim, if the Chair please, that that is a change of existing law. We of course have a general law that provides for the increase of the Navy, but we have no general law that provides that in the construction of the vessels of the Navy any one shipyard in the country can take a contract but for two vessels.

It is precisely an analogous case. We have in the language in this paragraph, in accordance with existing law, a provision for the increase of the Navy, but we have no existing provision of law providing that any number of battle ships shall be built in any one particular yard or that they shall be built in any particular section or on any particular coast line of the country. No one will contend that the provision reasserting the provisions of the act of 1901 as to this bill is not a change of existing law, because the act making the naval appropriations for 1901, while it was made law as to that act, referred only to the ships provided for in that act. I think the ruling I have referred to was made by the present occupant of the chair, and the ruling was made in accordance with a previous ruling which the Chair will find, made in connection with the same section by Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, on page 2158 of the RECORD I send to the Chairman.

Mr. ROBERTS. Is the gentleman from Maryland through?

Mr. MUDD. Nearly so.

Mr. METCALF. To what portion of this does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MUDD. I make the point of order to that portion of the paragraph from line 14, page 73, down to and including line 8, on page 74, that it is a change in existing law, and new legislation. It says in part:

And subject to the provisions hereinafter made, not more than one of said battle ships and not more than one of said armored cruisers and not more than one of said gunboats shall be built at or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or in the waters connected therewith.

All of the paragraph is clearly obnoxious to the rule to which I refer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would have made a point of order, had my attention been called to it earlier, to include all from line 11 down to end of the paragraph, and I would change my point of order now, so as to take in the three preceding lines, but I apprehend I can not, because debate has taken place on the other lines—10, 11, and 12.

Mr. VANDIVER. I understood the gentleman to reserve the point of order against the whole paragragh.

Mr. MUDD. I did not mean that. In other words, I am not "up against" the provision as to building ships in the navy-yard. The gentleman from Missouri need not be disturbed, therefore, as to that as yet.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am not referring to that part of it.

Mr. MUDD. My point of order is against only that portion of the paragraph which runs from line 14, page 73, down to and including line 8, on page 74.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland is untenable on two grounds. He begins at line 14, page 73, and makes his point of order to all that follows in that paragraph. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is well known that there is no general law governing the construction of battle ships or ships of any kind authorized in the naval bill; and yet this same paragraph in the preceding lines does authorize and point out the manner in which these ships shall be constructed, to wit, by contract. That does not change existing law, but is of itself a new law. That is new legislation, and that, I submit, Mr. Chairman, would have been subject to a point of order had it been raised.

Mr. MUDD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Mr. MUDD. Does the gentleman contend that if that was new legislation it does not contravene the rule that you can not change existing law?

Mr. ROBERTS. I maintain that there is no existing law. Then anything that makes a law is new legislation and is contrary to the rule. But the gentleman from Maryland misses the point I am trying to make. This authorizing the building of ships by contract is of itself legislation, and if the rule were to be construed according to its literal wording, then the point of order might have been raised against that authorization of construction by contract; but——

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROBERTS. If the gentleman will pardon me until I explain my position he will understand it. But no point of order was raised against that part of the paragraph which authorizes the construction of these vessels by contract. Hence under the long-continued practice of Speakers of the House and Chairmen in this body, the point of order not having been raised against that part of the bill, that part of it is then open to perfecting amendments. Now, an authorization to build these ships by contract can be, I submit, Mr. Chairman, altered or amended or perfected in any way that this body sees fit. Here in the very bill is a perfecting clause on that feature of the bill. It is rather a limitation on that general power to contract.

There is another point wherein the point of order, it seems to me, is bad. From line 23 on page 73 down to and including line 8 on page 74 is a provision increasing the cost of these battle ships. You have already, in another clause, fixed the price at which these ships shall be built, and then you go farther in the paragraph and make a limitation which in this case increases the cost; and it seems to me the Chair must hold that that limitation of cost, which itself is a proper subject of legislation, is germane and in order. I understand the rulings to be that if one portion of one part of the point of order is bad, the whole point of order is bad and must fail.

Mr. MUDD. In response to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], I want to call attention to paragraph 557 of the Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives:

The enactment of positive law where none exists is a change of existing law within the meaning of the rule.

It is hardly necessary for me to call the attention of the Chair to this ruling; but it disposes of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because he has expressly conceded that a portion of the provision against which my point of order is directed is new legislation; but, as he says, does not change existing law. It has been often held that new legislation where there was none before——

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman misses the whole point of my argument.

Mr. MUDD. I think the gentleman misses the point of his own argument.

Mr. ROBERTS. Not at all. I have said that the authorization of the building of these ships by contract is new legislation. Does the gentleman understand that proposition?

Mr. MUDD. I think I do.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then, no point of order having been raised against that provision, it can be perfected by amendment or limitation. That is what the remainder of the paragraph seeks to do. It may be called new legislation, but it is properly an amendment by way of limitation on new legislation, on which no point of order has been raised.

Mr. MUDD. The decision to which I have furnished a reference was as to language following a provision authorizing contracts, and related to the question of how many battle ships should be built at navy-yards, and if I recollect aright, also to where they should be built. It followed just such a clause as precedes this, which by analogy the gentleman would contend, being unobjected to, gave jurisdiction to what followed, which was of similar nature as that which follows here; but the Chair ruled otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] fails to make a distinction between a limitation upon an appropriation and a limitation upon an officer. It seems to the Chair that the limitation here is upon an officer, not upon an appropriation. Clearly this is a legislative provision. The present occupant of the chair made the ruling to which the gentleman from Maryland has referred in his argument, holding that legislation where none exists is a change of existing law. Still holding that same opinion the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order. The question is then upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, to strike out lines 11, 12, and 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer, as an amendment to what is left of this paragraph, the provision which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one of the battle ships, one of the armored cruisers, and one of the gunboats herein authorized in such Government navy-yard or navy-yards as he may designate; and for the purpose of preparing and equipping such navy-yard or navy-yards as may be so designated for the the construction of such ships the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for each of the navy-yards in which the Secretary of the Navy may direct any such ship or ships to be built.

Mr. ADAMS. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. ADAMS. I do, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. In the first place, I submit that the amendment is new legislation; in the second place, it changes existing law, and in the third place, it limits the discretion of the officer at the head of a department of the Government. If the Chair desires authorities on those three points, I have them here.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] has the floor.

Mr. VANDIVER. I make the point of order that there is so much noise we can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will please come to order.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask that the amendment be read again.

There being no objection, the Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry—whether any part of the bill on page 74 has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment, as the Chair understands, is offered to come in after line 10, page 73.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] think that we ought to read the next paragraph before he offers this amendment?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, no; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered to come in at the close of the paragraph as it is, after the exclusion of what has been ruled out on a point of order, and also the portion struck out by a vote of the Committee of the Whole in adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL].

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know just exactly what the parliamentary situation would be under the existing circumstances, but a portion of the language embraced in the proposed amendment has already been incorporated in the bill in lines 16 to 22, which have not yet been reached in the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. That part has not yet been reached.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it in order to offer an amendment embracing that portion of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, the Chair thinks so. If certain language is adopted by the Committee of the Whole in one part of the bill and subsequently the same language is reached in another part of the bill, the repetition of the language can be struck out. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. ADAMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I would cite Rule XXI, part 2, of the House, which prohibits any new legislation in an appropriation bill. Second, I would call the attention of the Chair to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that all purchases and contracts for supplies and services in any of the departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising, etc. I would state to the Chair that on first looking at this section of the Revised Statutes I did not think it applied, but when I turned and got a definition of the word "purchase" and of the word "purchases" I was compelled to come to the conclusion that this is a change of that statute. The definition of the word "purchase" is "to obtain or secure one's own by paying or promising to pay a fair price," and "to acquire [property] by one's own act or agreement, as distinguished from the mere operation of law."

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the term "agreement" is used here, and means the acquiring of anything by price or agreement. You will see also that in the wording of the statute that all "purchases and contracts" is the term used. In a grammatical construction it is a disjunctive, and therefore disapplies to purchases and contracts for supplies. Under that holding of the interpretation of the statute this is merely a change of existing law, and I submit that is the first point to determine why Rule XXI, part 2, should apply to this amendment which has been offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman answer how the——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I would rather conclude my argument without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ADAMS. In the next place, it is the enactment of new law. There is a line of decisions under the same section of the rules of the House which says it is not necessary to change existing law when a new law is enacted contrary to any established custom or without any provision beyond that relating to the matter; that it comes under the head of that rule, and there is a line of decisions on that point which I would be very glad to submit to the Chair. The third point, which has been held by several different decisions, is that any amendment restraining the discretion which is given under the general law to any head of a department is also new legislation.

There is a long line of decisions on that question, beginning with the Forty-seventh Congress, down to the present time. This limitation providing that the Secretary of the Navy must build one of these ships in a navy-yard of the United States is limiting his discretion under the general right that he has as the head of the Navy Department, which he is to administer according to law and his discretion. For these three reasons, Mr. Chairman, I hold, without any doubt in my own mind, having looked very carefully into the subject, that this is out of order. I will cite the decisions on each of these points, if the Chair would like to hear them, although I think probably the Chair is as fully aware of them as I am, including one of his own, which relates to a matter involving this same principle. If the Chair desires to hear them, I will cite them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be pleased to hear them.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information, and for information alone, and that is whether or not he thinks a battle ship comes under the head of supplies for the Government?

Mr. ADAMS. I have already enunciated that point. The term being disjunctive under grammatical construction, it means purchases first and supplies after, and therefore would apply to all purchases. I have already tried to state that. In regard to the decisions that this is new law I would cite Parliamentary Precedents, section 557, which is as follows:

The enactment of positive law where none exists is a change of existing law within the meaning of the rule. On February 4, 1896, the District of Columbia appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and Mr. Henry M. Baker, of New Hampshire, offered this amendment:

"For the support and medical treatment of medical and surgical patients who are destitute in the city of Washington, under a contract to be made with the Providence Hospital by the Surgeon-General of the Army, $15,000.

"For Garfield Memorial Hospital, for maintenance to enable it to provide medical and surgical treatment to persons unable to pay therefor, $15,000."

Mr. Franklin Bartlett, of New York, made the point of order that this would be a change of existing law.

After debate the chairman ruled:

"In the opinion of the Chair it is no answer to a point of order that the amendment changes existing law to say there is at present no statute law upon the subject. In the absence of statute law there is still a rule established by custom. That is the law, and any proposition which enacts positive law is a change of existing law in that respect. The enactments of law where none now exists is a change of existing law. It is acknowledged by the mover of this amendment that it does enact positive law where none now exists, and in that it changes existing law; and the point of order is sustained."

That, I think, Mr. Chairman, bears directly on the point before the House.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Navy will derive his entire power with reference to building these battle ships from the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. No; it will be limited.

Mr. FINLEY. But I say, does not this bill give him all the power and authority that he will have in reference to building these new vessels?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, if that be true, when we are giving him the authority and power to build these vessels why can we not direct his discretion also?

Mr. ADAMS. Because you are taking away from him the power that he has under the Constitution and general law to exercise his discretion as to the best way of building these ships. When you limit him you take away that discretion. Under these decisions, that is against the rule.

Mr. FINLEY. What particular law does the gentleman allude to in reference to that discretion which is vested in him, which we can not direct or limit or give him by this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. The law that gives the power to the Secretary of the Navy to conduct the affairs of that Department.

Mr. FINLEY. But the gentleman has just admitted that all the authority that the Secretary of the Navy will have in reference to the building of these vessels he will derive by virtue of and under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. That is for this particular construction, but——

Mr. FINLEY. Well, now, does not the discretion that we propose to limit apply to the particular vessels that are to be built under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. But in doing that the gentleman takes away the discretion, which is not permissible, because that is a change of existing law. That is the point I make.

Mr. FINLEY. What law?

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman will allow me, that is the point I am now raising. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] by his question has simply emphasized in a very strong way the point I make.

Mr. FINLEY. I differ entirely with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What discretion has the Secretary, considering the fact that this bill already provides that he shall build these vessels by contract? What discretion has he to do anything else?

Mr. ADAMS. The discretion left in him is to consider the bids of the contractors. He is not limited to the lowest bidder. He can exercise his judgment as to the capacity of a yard to construct any of the vessels bid for. He can take into consideration the responsibility of the bidders. All the discretion left in the Secretary by this bill you will take away from him in regard to one ship if you stipulate that it must be built in a Government yard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If you provide that they all must be built by contract, you take away the discretion he would have under the law without that provision to build them all in Government yards if he desired to do so, because there is no general law providing where the Secretary shall build ships of war.

Mr. ADAMS. I have been citing to the Chair the section of the Revised Statutes that does so provide—section 3709.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law, however, there is no dispute that the Secretary will have to buy all materials to be used in the building of these ships by advertising for them. If that construction be true, he can never even repair a ship in a Government yard, because that is a supply, and it would have to be obtained by contract.

Mr. ADAMS. I have heard the gentleman before on this point and I have read with great interest his remarks on the subject. He is raising now the same point that he has raised every time when this thing has come up, and the gentleman has been overruled.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows I was sustained the last time.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman was sustained by the occupant of the chair at that time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The present Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ADAMS. But it was not exactly on the same point that is involved now. If the gentleman will cite that case I shall be very glad to answer him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman hold that Congress has no right to restrain or control the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. ADAMS. I have not contended for any such thing. I say when you attempt to do it here on an appropriation bill it is new legislation, and therefore can not be done on that bill. It is not that we have not the power, but the point I make is that we have not the power to do it on an appropriation bill, because the proposition is new legislation and can not be considered on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You were reading a statute just now. Was that, he had to build our ships in certain places.

Mr. ADAMS. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any such statute?

Mr. ADAMS. There is no such statute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then how is this a change of "existing law?"

Mr. ADAMS. The statute that I cited was that in which it states that he must advertise for material, and that therefore the provision here which provides that he must build in a Government yard is new legislation.

Mr. GROW. What is the question now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GROW. I understand the question is a point of order made to a page of this bill. It seems to me my colleague, from what I can hear of the debate, is undertaking to decide it, instead of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS. In reply to my venerable colleague, "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" is endeavoring to answer the interrogatories of his colleagues in the wish to be courteous to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please give us that statute? I am very anxious to know what the statute is.

Mr. ADAMS. It is section 3709 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you read it, so that we can all know what it is?

Mr. ADAMS. I have already read it, and have submitted it to the Chair.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does it state?

Mr. ADAMS. The main part of it, to go over it again for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee, is this: All purchases of supplies and services in any department, except for personal services, shall be made by advertisement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you not know that the Secretary of the Navy has the power to advertise for iron and steel and coal and labor for the work that he may do in the navy-yards?

Mr. ADAMS. That is not the point involved. The question is not whether we can restrain the power of the Secretary of the Navy, but whether, under Rule XXI, clause 2, any amendment which changes existing law can be introduced, and this is undoubtedly a change of existing law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The question is, Is there any change of law? How is he going to get such things except by bids for material and for labor, because the Government has no coal or iron or timber lands?

Mr. ADAMS. This makes him build one of the ships in the navy-yards, and it takes away his discretion of where he shall build them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there a law providing that he shall build them at a certain place?

Mr. ADAMS. This very question was decided in the last Congress, in which a ruling was made, but not exactly on this point. It was an expansion of a provision already given.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, then, it is expansion that has given you the trouble. If that is so I am satisfied.

Mr. ADAMS. I am glad the gentleman has got the information he desires.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. From a source that I never received information before, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman had not gone to the reliable place to seek it. That is the reason that he is making these arguments in the House. I wish to cite two decisions upon this point, one made when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] occupied the chair, which was exactly on this point. Mr. FITZGERALD, who shows how well posted on this question he is, offered an amendment, which is as follows:

Amend by inserting before the word "three," in line 22, page 62, the following:

"To be constructed under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Navy in such of the navy-yards of the United States as are best adapted therefor."

Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] made the point of order on that amendment, and the Chair sustained the point of order. That is just exactly this question which I submit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman know that this amendment differs from the amendment just read? The language of the pending amendment does not use these words, but says such yards as he may designate.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to say to the gentleman that that to my mind only makes it stronger.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But if the gentleman will allow me, the former decision held that it would direct the Secretary of the Navy to have our vessels constructed in yards without certain equipments.

Mr. ADAMS. Exactly the same point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This does not limit him to any particular navy-yard. He can build them in any navy-yard.

Mr. ADAMS. But it limits his discretion, and puts in a stringent restriction which says he must build in one of the navy-yards.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It says in one or the other.

Mr. ADAMS. The same question precisely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is entirely different.

Mr. ADAMS. I will have to differ with the gentleman on that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the authorities that I have cited, well known as they are, all fall away before the one I am about to quote—of an eminent parliamentarian who has occupied the chair here often and rendered so many able and learned opinions, Mr. SHERMAN, of New York. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the points which I desire to be heard upon just for a moment only will be found in lines 19, 20, 21, and 22 on page 59, and not more than two of said battle ships, and not more than two of said armored cruisers, and not more than two of said protected cruisers shall be built in one yard or by one contracting party.

After debate the Chair sustained the point of order, and that is exactly the principle involved in this question.

Mr. Chairman, I have more authorities here, but I really think I have submitted sufficient to call the attention of the Chair to the position I hold.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania alleges three grounds upon which his point of order should be sustained—first, that the amendment under discussion changes existing law, and he cites as the existing law the following words: "All purchases and contracts for supplying the service in any department of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by the department." Then he goes into a long and complicated dissertation prying out hidden meanings of words, trying to make it appear that building a battle ship is purchasing supplies for the Government. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that proposition is too ridiculous for further consideration. I maintain that under that section of the Revised Statutes read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania there is no law whatever on the subject of how, when, where, and by whom a battle ship shall be built in the United States. He then alleges as another reason that the amendment proposed is new legislation.

Well, now, Mr. Chairman, suppose he is correct in that. I think he is nearer correct in that proposition than any other he has advanced. Suppose he is correct; suppose that it is new legislation if it stood by itself. But it does not stand by itself. The amendment under discussion is an amendment to a part of this bill which, if the point of order had been raised, would have been ruled out as new legislation. I believe there is no question that the limitation and the instructions given to the Secretary of the Navy in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 in this bill are new legislation, because there is no law on the statute book instructing the Secretary of the Navy how, where, and when he shall build battle ships, and when you say to him that the contracts for the construction of each of said battle ships so contracted for shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery, you are creating a law for his guidance.

There is no statute that controls that; that language is entirely new legislation. The point not having been raised on that topic of new legislation, it is within the province of this committee to go ahead and by proper amendment change, alter, and perfect that provision which, if the point of order had been raised, would have been ruled out.

Mr. ADAMS. Is there any existing law that says that he shall build battle ships in the navy-yards?

Mr. ROBERTS. No law whatever in regard to the building of battle ships.

Mr. ADAMS. Then it is new legislation.

Mr. ROBERTS. I say it is new legislation. Lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 on page 73 are new legislation.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that provision of letting them by contract is new legislation.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is what I said. All the provisions in regard to contracts either by the President or by the Secretary of the Navy are new legislation and would be subject to a point of order had it been raised, but nobody rose on the floor to make the point of order against this provision; and the point of order not having been raised, these matters in the bill are subject to amendment.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and of the Chair to section 1068 of the Parliamentary Precedents of the House.

On June 14, 1884, the House was considering Senate amendments to the post-office appropriation bill, among which was the following: "For special facilities in trunk lines, $185,000."

It was moved to recede and concur in the amendment with an amendment making the same $250,000.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that this amendment was not in order.

The Speaker held:

While the Chair supposes there is no permanent provision of law authorizing this expenditure, still the proposition to expend a certain amount of money for that purpose is now properly before the House, and the Chair thinks that the proposition, being properly before the House, is amendable without regard to the rule applying to an original amendment proposed in the House. In other words, as an illustration, if the Committee on Appropriations should report a bill containing within it a provision not directly authorized by law, amendments proposed to such a provision should not be ruled out upon the point of order, because the subject upon which they are predicated, being virtually before the House, is a legitimate subject of amendment, either by increasing or diminishing the amount of the appropriation. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Again, on the 21st of December, 1896, the same decision was made when a point of order was raised under the same conditions. The whole gist of the decision being that matter which is subject to a point of order if raised in time, and a point of order not being raised, was properly before the House, and could then be amended, and that no point of order could be raised against the amendment simply because the amendment, if it stood by itself, was new legislation. On March 17, 1898, the same ruling was again made, that the matter being properly before the House, although subject to a point of order if raised in time, was open to amendment, and the point of order could not be raised that the amendment changed existing law or was new legislation.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the section that follows.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not care about the section that follows. We are not discussing that. We are discussing the amendment offered to this section. The section which follows has nothing to do with the matter before the House or before the Chair for decision. I do not care anything about that language. I know it. I drafted it myself.

Now, there is one other ground upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] rests his point of order; that, thirdly, the amendment I have proposed limits and restricts the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Where does the gentleman find the law which specifies what is to be the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy? Where does he find any provision which limits or enlarges the discretion which that officer has?

But whether there is a law defining that discretion or whether the Secretary of the Navy gets his discretion under the Constitution of the United States, the language in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 of this bill is a limitation on his discretion; and if the point of order is good against my amendment, it would have been good against those lines. The point was not raised. Therefore the discretionary power of the Secretary of the Navy contained in these lines is open to an amendment.

Just one concluding statement. When the last appropriation bill from the Naval Committee, which carried an authorization of ships, was under discussion the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offered an amendment providing that ships should be built in the navy-yards; and after debate, and after the reading of the statute of the United States which is said to regulate the building of these ships, but which I think all sensible and reasonable men must conclude has no bearing whatever upon the subject, Mr. Moody, then occupying the chair, made this decision:

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York seeks to amend this section in such a way that the President be authorized to construct these ships enumerated in the section either by contract or in the navy-yards of the United States. The provision reported by the committee only authorizes the construction of the ships by contract. There has been no general law suggested to the Chair which would be altered by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. The Chair, therefore, is compelled to think that it is in order, in the absence of any such statute, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to pursue that just a little bit further. Suppose that the section of the Revised Statutes does regulate the building of ships in the navy-yards; will anybody tell me wherein any of the terms of that statute will be contravened by ordering ships to be built in navy-yards? Why, sir, if we put the building of ships into navy-yards, they have to be built under that section; all supplies must be advertised for. We do not contravene or change the law in that respect—not in the slightest degree. The work will go on in the navy-yards in the construction of the ships just exactly as it goes on to-day in the repair of ships. When they want material or supplies for repairs they advertise and get them by public proposals, and when they want material and supplies for the building of ships in the navy-yards they will still be regulated and governed by that law; there will be absolutely no change of existing law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the provision extending from line 14 to the end of the paragraph upon which the point of order was raised, and upon which the Chair has just ruled, is "on all fours" with the provision in this amendment. If the point of order lay in one case it ought to lie in the other case. I can see no difference in principle.

It is not necessary to discuss what the Chair might have decided in the event that a point of order had been made against the whole paragraph; nor is it necessary to discuss whether this question was originally decided wrongly under the rules of the House, embracing a line of decisions under which the Navy has been practically constructed.

The only possible claim or excuse under which any part of this provision could at any time have been in order is that the law authorizes a navy, and this is an incident of that authorization. Now, take the provision as it stands. If enacted, there is no question that under it a navy could be further constructed. It is not necessary to hold this exact amendment in order to enable a navy to be constructed—to carry out the general provisions of the law. But this provision goes on and amends the law aliunde the construction of a navy, providing right upon its face that the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one battle ship, etc.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman tell us what the statute means?

Mr. CANNON. Whatever the statute may mean, this amendment proposes to make new law. It undertakes to prescribe what the Secretary of the Navy shall do. Now, what do you want to accomplish by this? You want to force the building of three or more of these ships in navy-yards. That is what you want to accomplish. Now, under the law as it is to-day, can you do that? If so, then there is no use of this amendment. The very object of the amendment is to change the law.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me——

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. CANNON. I decline to yield in toto until I finish this sentence—absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. And unqualifiedly. I say again the amendment—in my judgment, the whole of it—is subject to the point of order, but under the practice of the House, for the purpose of constructing a Navy—the general law authorizing a Navy—we have heretofore held it in order to provide for the construction of ships. Well, now, when that point is accomplished, in my judgment the Committee of the Whole ought not to go along in the whole field of legislation. I think the Chair had that in view a few moments ago when he sustained the point of order from line 14 or 13, whichever it was, to the close of the paragraph.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow me in that connection?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; in a minute.

Mr. TATE. Do you mean to convey the idea that the Congress has a right to provide for the building of ships, and yet it has not the right to provide where and how those ships shall be built?

Mr. CANNON. I mean to convey the idea that this whole line of appropriations is vicious and against the rules of the House, and it should be held strictly, and we should not go one step beyond the point that Congress or the House or the Committee of the Whole went when it held this kind of appropriation and legislation in order. It is vicious, it is against the rules, and it ought to be strictly held. Now, if the chairman did not have that view of it, how in the world did the Chair just sustain the point of order from line 14 to the end of the paragraph?

Mr. ROBERTS. Does the gentleman want me to answer that for him?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am not hungering and thirsting for the gentleman to answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TATE. Surely my friend from Illinois does not mean to say that the power to authorize the building of a battle ship does not carry with it the power to say where and how it shall be built?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think under that law that the President has certain power, but this steps in and changes that power; it makes it mandatory upon the Secretary that he shall do so and so. It is legislation from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, in my judgment, and unwise legislation, legislation against the rules of the House, and from every standpoint of proper construction I believe the point of order ought to be sustained.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the observations just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that the ruling that the Chair made a moment ago on the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] made it necessary that he should sustain this point of order, indicates what I have apprehended from the beginning of this discussion, that one very important consideration in this matter has been overlooked. Whatever may be done with this point of order, it will not be sustained because the Chair sustained the last one, for the reason given by the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, I am not much of a parliamentary sharp, but I understand that the paragraph down to the point whereto the amendment is proposed is passed. It is no longer subject to the point of order, but only to amendments. Now, that paragraph differs from every paragraph similar to it that has yet appeared in a naval appropriation bill, and it differs from it in a particular so important that it seems to me that it settles the question of the propriety of this amendment. That paragraph stands now subject to proper amendment, and necessarily subject to every provision needful to perfect it. Now, this proposition does not declare that the Secretary of the Navy shall construct by contract alone. It says he shall construct by contract "except as herein otherwise provided," so that the provision that is already passed, that is beyond the reach of any point of order, makes it necessary that we shall provide some other way of building a naval vessel than by contract.

Now, then, whatever there may be in the original proposition that was wrong, it stands, and whatever is necessary to make that perfect must be as proper as the original paragraph itself. Now we go on to perfect this provision. The point of order that the Chairman sustains related to portions of this section that are not referred to in the phrase "except as herein otherwise provided." The provisions thus stricken out were limitations merely on the method of contracting. The provision that is sought to be inserted by this amendment is to comply with that limitation upon the contract, not as to its methods, but that some of these vessels should be otherwise built than by contract. Such alone is the purpose of this amendment. It is not only proper; it is necessary. The bill as it stands now demands the addition of some provision for building ships otherwise than by contract.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will bear with me just a moment, I would like to give it information that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], not now in his seat, was so anxiously inquiring for a few moments ago. He says, Why did the other lines of the bill go out on a point of order? They went out on a point of order because they were contrary to the rule, and the point of order was raised. But the point of order has not been raised on lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, and can not now be raised, and under the rule those lines, and all that precede in that paragraph, are subject to proper amendment. And there is where the Chairman of this committee can very properly distinguish between the two rulings on a point of order, which at first blush might seem to involve the same ultimate decision.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] argues, if I understand him correctly, that the jurisdiction to entertain the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] is given by the words following the words—constructed by contract—

Those words being—except as herein otherwise provided.

The gentleman from Ohio will hardly contend seriously, I think, that an exception of that kind gives to the committee the jurisdiction to make an illegal or unparliamentary amendment. That language must be read to mean, except as otherwise provided in accordance with law and the rules of the House. It can not mean anything else, and can not give any further authority and jurisdiction than that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that gentlemen lose sight of the point here. No one is arguing against this, because it is a provision not previously authorized by law. That is not the point wherein we contend this is obnoxious to the rule, but the point is that this provision is a change of existing law.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman please state what law it changes, if any?

Mr. MUDD. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. TATE. I should like to know what existing law it changes. I have heard that statement made on that side, and I should like to know what law the gentleman refers to.

Mr. MUDD. I will answer that question as to what existing law it changes. Gentlemen seem to think that in some way this is a limitation upon an appropriation. That is not the case at all. If this provision were a mere limitation upon the quantum of appropriation, or a limitation upon expenditure, it would be in order; but it is not that. It is a limitation upon the discretion of an officer of the law, and that is wherein it changes existing law. The discretion of the President of the United States, not only in a legal sense, but in an actual sense, is an existing fact and is an existing law, wherein he is authorized to exercise it; but a new provision, where none had existed before, limiting by mandatory requirement the exercise of that discretion, is clearly a change of existing law.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the President does have this discretion until this bill becomes a law?

Mr. MUDD. Even if it be seriously contended that because there is now in the bill, unobjected to, a provision authorizing the President to have these vessels constructed by contract, there being no point of order made against that provision, it can not be contended that a provision abrogating that discretion by a mandatory clause, saying that the authority and discretion are entirely taken away, is in order.

Now, I will not argue this further, except to call attention to an authority upon this point. I read from section 531 of Parliamentary Precedents, a work written by the gentleman who furnishes parliamentary information to so many of us in this House and who aids the Chair as well as the rest of us.

Section 531 is to the following effect:

It has generally been held that provisions giving a new construction of law—

That is not this case—

or limiting the discretion which has been exercised by officers charged with the duties of administration are changes of law within the meaning of the rule.

That is the authority that governs this case and upon which I think the Chairman may safely rely. This amendment does limit and circumscribe the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy in the most mandatory way in which it could be done.

Mr. RIXEY. As the matter now stands, there is no discretion in the Secretary of the Navy. He has to build by contract. This amendment proposes to direct him to build in another way.

Mr. MUDD. That is a change of existing law.

Mr. RIXEY. Suppose the amendment does not prevail, then there is no discretion.

Mr. MUDD. If it does not prevail, it does nothing. If it does, it is making a new law as to how he shall exercise his discretion, different from the free exercise of it or the usual exercise of it or the character of exercise of it authorized in the bill. It is in no sense akin to or germane to the manner or scope of the authority committed to him by the provisions of the bill as proposed, and is, in my judgment, against the letter and the spirit of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the section of the Revised Statutes to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] refers does not control in this case. In the opinion of the Chair that section does not cover such a provision as is included in this section of the bill; but the universal holdings of Speakers and Chairmen—that in the absence of any statute the creation of a statute is a change of existing law—does apply in this case. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] argues, and properly argues—to that extent—that this provision was susceptible to a point of order, had the point of order been raised.

That point of order not having been raised, his contention is that it can be amended in any way, and he cites, amongst other rulings in support of that contention, a ruling of Mr. Speaker Carlisle, a most eminent parliamentarian; but the Chair notices in reading that decision that Speaker Carlisle expressly says that a provision before the committee which would have been out of order had the point been raised, the point not having been raised is amendable; but he says that that amendment may be made either by increasing or diminishing the amount of the appropriation, clearly showing that in Speaker Carlisle's mind there was this idea, that the section could be amended in any germane manner within its original scope.

Nothing in Speaker Carlisle's opinion indicated any thought that the scope of an amendment could be enlarged by an amendment if the provision originally would have been susceptible to a point of order. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a separate proposition, clearly would be susceptible to a point of order. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts himself would admit this. Therefore it seems to the Chair that the question has resolved itself into this: Can the committee do by indirection that which it can not do directly? It seems to the Chair it is a very dangerous precedent to establish to permit such a thing to be done.

The Chair admits that the disposition of this point of order is embarrassing to him. As the Chair remembers, this is the first time he has disposed of a point of order while occupying this chair about which he did not feel absolutely clear, and certainly the Chair must admit that there is some little doubt in his mind about this question; and yet he thinks that the fact that the committee ought to be prevented from doing by indirection that which it can not do directly ought to prevail. This amendment, had it originally been in the text of the bill, unquestionably would have been held out of order. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the doubt in the mind of the Chair, I would respectfully beg leave to appeal from the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals from the decision of the Chair; and the question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 85; noes 73.

Mr. TATE. Tellers!

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TATE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] will please act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and tellers reported—ayes 86; noes 109.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was put.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the committee is dividing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman arose and addressed the Chair for the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made the request that the amendment be read. The amendment can not again be reported except by unanimous consent. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to debate the amendment.

Mr. BALL of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will please cease conversation. The committee will be in order before any business is transacted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas first rose.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Did not the Chair declare that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts carried?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so declare.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair announced one side.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did not the Chair announce the vote—the numbers in the affirmative and the numbers in the negative?

The CHAIRMAN. That was on the appeal from the decision of the Chair. The question is on the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. I desire the House to pause for a moment to hear what this amendment is. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the amendment be read in his time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one of the battle ships, one of the armored cruisers, and one of the gunboats herein authorized in such Government navy-yard or navy-yards as he may designate; and for the purpose of preparing and equipping the navy-yard or navy-yards as may be so designated for the construction of such ships the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for each of the navy-yards in which the Secretary of the Navy may direct any such ship or ships to be built.

Mr. FOSS. I desire to have the committee completely and fully understand what this proposition means. We have already experimented upon building ships in the navy-yards, and we have found by past experience that it costs anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent more. That was true in the case of the Texas and the Maine, the Raleigh and the Cincinnati. Now, it has been said that our navy-yards at that time were not in as efficient condition as they are at the present time. That is undoubtedly true. But I wish to have the committee hear a statement of Admiral Bowles, the last expression which he has made to the committee upon this question, as to the relative cost between building ships in Government yards, as they are to-day, and under private contract. Here is a letter which he directed to the Secretary of the Navy. He says:

In case it is decided to build a battle ship or an armored cruiser in any navy-yard, it would be necessary to have a simultaneous appropriation of $175,000 to provide a slipway, traveling crane, and to carry electric and pneumatic power to the building slip in order that the navy-yard plant should be on an equality with private yards in mechanical facilities for shipyard work.

After we have made appropriations for every navy-yard in which a ship is to be built, he says:

In my judgment, a vessel built in a navy-yard under existing conditions, as to administration, wages, hours of labor, leaves of absence, etc., would cost, by the least estimate, 25 per cent more than if built by contract.

That is the judgment of Admiral Bowles, the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. So I call the attention of the committee to it at this time because I wish them to understand that if the battle ship or armored cruiser or gunboat costs, as Admiral Bowles says it will cost, 25 per cent more to build in a Government navy-yard——

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FOSS. What is it?

Mr. CLAYTON. Does Admiral Bowles give any facts or detailed statement or specific reason for the basis of that opinion which you have quoted?

Mr. FOSS. He has given it in previous hearings.

Mr. CLAYTON. Has he not in previous hearings expressed the contrary opinion to that you have read?

Mr. FOSS. No; not on the subject of cost.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am so informed.

Mr. TATE. He did advocate the building of ships in the navy-yard two years ago.

Mr. FOSS. When he was constructor at the New York Navy-Yard he advocated the building of ships in the navy-yards, but he never said in his hearing at that time that it would cost less to build a ship in a navy-yard than under private contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he did say that, and I will read it. He said:

I will guarantee, if I had three months to start it, I could do in the New York Navy-Yard what can not be done in any organization in this country. I could build ships cheaper than anyone can, and I know it.

He has never produced any facts as a basis upon which to change his opinion since that time. That was in 1897, and since that time the navy-yards have been equipped to a much higher point of efficiency.

Mr. FOSS. Admiral Bowles said, substantially, "if you will let me make the conditions I will build a ship cheaper in the Government yard, or as cheap, as under private contract.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. I do not care to be interrupted further. I want to answer this question.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if he will permit me to read from Admiral Bowles's statement.

Mr. FOSS. I am going to take——

Mr. CLAYTON. You called Admiral Bowles as a witness, now let us cross-examine him.

Mr. FOSS. After the direct examination is finished, and not until then. We are proceeding with the direct examination, and the cross-examination always comes afterwards. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Admiral Bowles says, substantially, "You let me make the conditions and I think I can build your ships just as cheaply as they can be done under private contract."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is that testimony?

Mr. FOSS. How did Admiral Bowles want to change the present conditions in order to do that? In the first place, he wanted to make the hours of labor the same in the Government yards as in the private yards. Now, there is a difference of between eight and ten hours. He wanted to wipe out the leaves of absence, which cost the Government in the navy-yards a million and a half dollars, at least, a year. Not only that, but he said he wanted to work the labor in the navy-yard by the piece and not by the day, the same as in private yards. What more? He wanted to wipe out all the holidays. Then he said, "I want to reduce all the wages which we are paying 30 or 40 per cent." We are paying 30 or 40 per cent more in the navy-yards than we are in the private yards, and he wanted to reduce them down to the level of the private yards.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the object in your position here to-day?

Mr. FOSS. I am giving you what Admiral Bowles said. Let me make the conditions and I will build your ships as cheaply in the Government yards as they can be built under private contract. But under the present conditions, with the hours of labor different, with the wages 30 and 40 per cent more, with two weeks' leave of absence, with seven or eight holidays during the year, it will cost 25 per cent more. There is his statement. In other words, gentlemen, if you vote for this provision, you must do it with your eyes open. You will add to the appropriation for the cost of construction of ships 25 per cent to the cost of the battle ship which is to cost seven and a half million dollars. You will add 25 per cent more to the cost of an armored cruiser which will cost under private contract six and one-half million dollars. If the Admiral is right, you will add $3,000,000 to the cost of the construction of your ships provided for in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. No, I will not yield to anyone. I do not want to be discourteous, but I want to finish my argument.

Now, you will do that. I call your attention to this matter, because, if you do this, I want you to do it with your eyes open to all the facts of the case. It is costing money to build up the American Navy. It costs $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 to build a battle ship, and it costs a thousand dollars a day to maintain it after it is built. Can we, as representatives of the people, charged with the duty of guarding with jealous care the public Treasury—can we consistently appropriate two or three million more for the construction of these ships simply to satisfy a demand which has largely been manufactured for the construction of ships in our navy-yards?

Why, sir, the men in our navy-yards are well employed to-day. As we proceed with the construction of ships they will have more and more to do. You are not helping them out by such a measure as this at all. If they are not employed in the navy-yards, they will be employed in the private yards. But all of them are well employed to-day. By this provision you are, in my judgment, simply adding to the cost of the construction of your ships. You are voting against the interests of the taxpayer, and in the end you will bring public condemnation upon the Navy for extravagant appropriations. These are serious questions for you to consider, and I desire simply to call your attention to them before you come to a vote.

As I said the other day, I have given some consideration to this question. In England, in France, in Germany, where the conditions in private yards and in Government yards are on a basis of equality, even in those countries, ships can not be built as cheaply in the Government yards as they can in the private yards. In Germany, with conditions equal, the cost is at least 10 to 25 per cent more to build in Government yards. Now, with all the experience before you of our own country, and also in foreign countries, in the building of ships, will you add to the cost of the construction of these ships, according to the statement of our best naval authority upon this subject, 25 per cent, to be taken out of the pockets of the American people?

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is already in this bill a provision for the building of a ship in one of our navy-yards. The purpose of that provision (and the provision is full and complete) is that there may be an honest contest, and an honest account kept, to determine whether or not ships can be built in the navy-yards as cheaply as by private contract. That provision, I repeat, is already in the bill.

Now, this amendment provides that three of these ships shall be built in navy-yards. If the friends of the project of building ships in our navy-yards are honest and sincere and want this experiment made in a fair way, and if they are not afraid of the result of that experiment, why do they demand that this experiment shall be made with more than one ship, when, according to the highest authority, it is shown that each experiment of this kind upon a battle ship will cost a million dollars to this Government? I ask this Committee of the Whole, in all fairness and all reason, that if we are to test this question, it be done in a businesslike way. Let us not proceed in this matter extravagantly.

I have tried my very best to bring myself to the conclusion that ships can be built in navy-yards as cheaply as by contract. I have honestly come to the conclusion that it can not be done. There are very many others who have reached that conclusion. The Secretary of the Navy reached that conclusion, and I may say that substantially every chief of bureau in the Navy Department has reached that conclusion. Those who have given the subject the most careful and thorough consideration have reached that conclusion. Why? Because, in the first place, the hours of daily labor are eight in the navy-yards, while they are ten where the work is done under private contract. Then, again, wages are from 15 to 30 per cent higher in the navy-yards. Then, also, two weeks' vacation, with pay, is given in the navy-yards. All the conditions point to the fact that it must necessarily cost more to build a battle ship in a navy-yard than by private contract.

But in order to settle this question the Naval Committee, in its wisdom, has provided in this bill that one of the ships should be built in a navy-yard, and that a full and accurate account should be kept by the Secretary of the Navy of the expenditures in the construction of this ship, and also in the construction of similar ships by contract, so that we could make a comparison fairly and squarely. Now, is not that enough? Why should there be an insistance upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts that three of these vessels shall be built in Government navy-yards, when the result must be that if it should turn out that it cost $1,000,000 more, as the weight of authority indicates, to build one of these ships in a Government yard the experiment will cost us $3,000,0000 instead of $1,000,000?

Mr. TATE. The reason for urging this amendment is that the question of relative cost is now before us, and we must dispose of it. If we provide for building one vessel of each class by contract, and one of each class in the navy-yards of the country, we can arrive at the exact cost in each case and settle this question.

Mr. DAYTON. I have the very highest regard for the judgment and good business sense of my friend from Georgia, with whom I have been associated for a number of years; but I submit that his logic on this question will not hold at all. If you can make an accurate comparison by building three, you can make such a comparison by building one. Certainly we do not want to take any more risk of loss than is necessary.

Answer me this question: If in your ordinary business affairs you were contemplating a change of this kind, under such circumstances that you had absolutely no reason for reaching the conclusion in advance that you would save money, if you were in doubt whether by making the change you could do as well as you had been doing and lose no money, would you embark upon such a change in a wholesale manner or tentatively? What we want to do is to get at the facts in regard to this. My friends are greatly mistaken when they think that this is in the interest of the laboring men of this country. It simply means this: The navy-yards of this country can employ only a limited number of laboring men in them, and when that limit is reached no more can be employed. It is taking the labor from one class of men and giving to those who already have, giving one an abundance of work, but at the expense of the other.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does it not take the same amount of labor to construct a ship in a navy-yard as in a private yard?

Mr. DAYTON. That is true, if the yards had the room to do it, but you understand it is the question of capacity.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does it not take the same construction and capacity in one place as in the other?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask to be permitted to continue two minutes in order to answer this last question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAYTON. Here is the question: There must necessarily be in the navy-yard a considerable number of men engaged in repair work. That must go on, and then there is only a limited capacity in the yard for these additional laborers to continue the work of construction on the ship.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman does not charge the repair work to the construction of a new vessel.

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, no; not at all. I say it is a question of the capacity of the yard. What would be the result? The work will continue for a long number of years—the construction—twice as long as it would in a private yard, and the select few in that yard will have labor continuously which otherwise would have gone to the workmen in the private yards.

Mr. HANBURY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HANBURY. Will the gentleman answer this question? Where will the enormous profits derived from the building of ships by private corporations go if the battle ships are built in the Government navy-yards?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They will stay in the pockets of the people; that is where they will go.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to answer the gentleman that I do not think there are enormous profits. I think when it is taken into consideration that a shipbuilder furnishes us the completed product, carries all questions of insurance, and guarantees that that ship shall be a perfect machine, which has to be tested and tried before acceptance, the profits in the shipbuilding industry are less than in any other in this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, it is very pathetic indeed to hear the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] pleading with this committee in the interests of the laboring man and asking us to direct where work shall be done solely for the benefit of the laboring man. Why, Mr. Chairman, the laboring men of this country, through their national organizations of the skilled trades interested in shipbuilding, came before the gentleman from West Virginia, sitting in committee, and they did not plead to have this work done in private yards because it would be for their benefit or that they would be better off if it should be done there. They were men working in both public and private yards, and they are supposed to know the conditions that apply in those two yards.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. ROBERTS. And they say if they are to be consulted they would like to have at least some of this work done in the Government yards.

Mr. DAYTON. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question? Did not those representatives distinctly state that they did not want all the work done in the navy-yards, but they wanted a test, an experiment made, and that this would be satisfactory?

Mr. ROBERTS. Why, my dear sir, I have not made any statement that the laboring men wanted all the work done in public yards. If the gentleman will listen to what I am saying he would know I made no such statement and said nothing from which such an inference could be drawn. Now, the chairman of our committee, a gentleman whom I esteem very highly, has what seems to me one of the most peculiar consciences I have ever seen. You will find in his speech made the other day that he favors building one battle ship or one armored cruiser in a navy-yard, and he then went on to explain to this House that it might cost 50 per cent more to build it in that public yard than in a private yard. His conscience would stretch to the extent of a 50 per cent excess of cost of one ship in order to do this work, while to-day it can not stretch to the extent of a 50 per cent excess of cost of two ships.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. I merely wish to suggest that the chairman of the committee has changed his opinion, like Admiral Bowles, who has changed his, and it makes us busy keeping track of the changes of opinion of those in authority.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee does not certainly wish to put me in a bad light here.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, no; not at all. I have too high a regard for the gentleman.

Mr. FOSS. I have said that I am in favor of building one ship in the navy-yard as an experiment, to find out——

Mr. ROBERTS. That is all I said. I have said only that.

Mr. FOSS. To find out whether we have been paying exorbitant prices to shipbuilders, and as a sort of guide for the future policy of the construction of the Navy; but I was in favor of building only one, not three.

Mr. ROBERTS. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. I have the floor and I have only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. FOSS. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. ROBERTS. What I said was that the chairman was willing to stretch his conscience in this robbery of the taxpayers to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost of one battle ship, but it was so tender that he could not stretch it to rob them of 50 per cent of the cost of two battle ships.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow one question?

Mr. ROBERTS. I have only five minutes.

Mr. TATE. I want the gentleman to state the matter fairly and to say further that the chairman of the committee [Mr. FOSS] was in favor of giving discretion to the Secretary of the Navy to build all these battle ships in public yards.

Mr. ROBERTS. I was coming to that. I wish the gentleman would let me make my own speech. It would please me better.

Mr. TATE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ROBERTS. However, since the gentleman has informed the committee that the chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] in committee and on the floor of this House was willing to give the Secretary of the Navy discretion to build all the ships in public yards where, as he says, the cost will be 50 per cent more than in a private yard, his attitude when we attempt to instruct the Secretary as to the exact number he shall build seems to me rather peculiar.

Now I want to call attention to one thing in the amendment which is now pending. If the members of the committee will examine it they will see that the discretionary feature which appeared in the bill originally has been eliminated, and if the amendment is adopted then the Secretary of the Navy must build one of each class of vessels authorized by contract and one of each class in a Government yard.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] if he does not think that the bill as originally reported from the committee gives a discretionary power to the Secretary of the Navy to build all these ships in a Government navy-yard if he wants to?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; I have just stated that that was what the bill originally contemplated; but my amendment has done away with that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask that my time be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, just one moment.

Mr. ROBERTS. I want to answer the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] first. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the amendment I have offered is not adopted, when you come to the provision authorizing one ship to be built in a Government yard and giving discretion to the Secretary of the Navy to build them all, when you reach that stage, it will all go out on a point of order, and you will have nothing built in a navy-yard, and you will leave no discretion in the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to know if it would not be to the interest of the Government to leave this discretionary rather than mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I am not so clear in my own mind about that. I think that is a matter of individual opinion. I think I know the state of mind of the Secretary of the Navy, and if I understand his state of mind, he does not want this discretion vested in him, because it may mean all sorts of complications, and all sorts of pressure brought to bear upon him. He would prefer definite action one way or the other on this question of building ships in public or private yards.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if, in making that statement, he is authorized to say that the Secretary of the Navy does not desire it.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am not, and I did not say that I was authorized. I said that I thought I knew the state of mind of the Secretary of the Navy, and that if I did know it, that was the fact. I did not say I was authorized to make any statement. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that in the private yards they are crowded with work, being from twenty months to three years behind?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know anything about the private yards. I have not the slightest knowledge about that. They may be crowded with work and they may not be, but that has no bearing on my view of the case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was about to state to the gentleman——

Mr. ROBERTS. If the gentleman wants to get in, will he kindly let me conclude? Then he will get his opportunity all the sooner.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman does not want to be interrupted, I am perfectly willing to wait. I merely desired to give him a little information.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have been interrupted so much that I prefer not to be interrupted further. I have only a few moments.

Now, one or two facts with regard to building ships in public or private yards. It must be evident to the members of this committee, from the debate which has gone on here for days on this subject, that there is at present in the possession of the Navy Department and in the possession of members of this body no definite information upon which we can base our decision as to a final and settled policy in this respect. It is asserted here that this is going to cost anywhere from 25 to 70 per cent more to build a ship in a Government yard than to build the same ship in a private yard.

Gentlemen can not seem to agree upon what this excess of cost is going to be. But mark this, not one of these gentlemen who have been in favor of building these ships in private yards has risen on this floor and told this committee that in addition to the contract price which we must pay the private builders, this Government is paying out on each and every one of our great battle ships built in a private yard, where the cost runs up to three or four million dollars, anywhere from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars in addition, an amount which goes, not to the constructor of that ship in the private yard, but paid in wages to Government employees who are stationed in these private yards inspecting the construction of that ship, and you only get at the cost of the Government ship built in the private shipyards when you add on all this cost of inspection to the contract price. Then you get at the sum total you pay for the ship.

Now, as to my private opinion, I want to state to this committee that personally I am not committed to the continued policy of this Government building all its ships in its own yards, nor to the policy of all our ships being built in private yards. There is a great sentiment, I believe, throughout this country that the Government of the United States, with a hundred million dollars invested in navy-yards, should do something in those yards besides the mere repairing of ships now in existence or that may be built hereafter. I believe, and my belief is strengthened by the diverse contentions on each side of the proposition, that it is in the interest of the Government, although the cost of these ships may perhaps exceed slightly the cost that would be incurred if they were built in private yards, to undertake the experiment.

You can not find a case where the Government has built a ship in a public yard that you can get an exact comparison with one built in a private yard, for the reason that never have two ships of the same size, the same class, and the same cost been constructed one in a public yard and the other in a private yard at the same time, when conditions would be absolutely equal. And that, Mr. Chairman, is my reason for offering the amendment now before the committee, in order that this experiment may be tried fully and completely. We have some figures of ships built in Government yards, but you can not find anywhere a sister ship built in a private yard at that or any other time.

The comparison must be a relative one, and on such a comparison this question will never be settled. But if we authorize one of each class to be constructed simultaneously, one in a Government yard and one in a private yard, we shall have the conditions as to price of labor, price of materials, the time which it takes to construct the ships, and everything else exactly equal, and then we can get the results on which a future House can pass judgment as to what shall be the policy of the Government.

Something was said the other day as a reason why we should not build the ships in Government yards that if the ship was a failure the Government must suffer the loss, whereas if it was built in a private yard and the ship was a failure the loss would fall upon the private contractor. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, or any member of this House, if he will point out an instance where a ship built in a private yard has not been ultimately accepted by the Government? The silence, Mr. Chairman, which pervades this Chamber in not answering my inquiry must settle that question. The Government pays a good round price for the ship whether it is built in private yard or a public yard.

As a further, and the last, reason for the building of these ships in a Government yard, I do not believe it is a good policy for this Government to go on maintaining these great navy-yards, representing enormous investments of money, simply for the purpose of repairing ships, leaving the original construction entirely in the hands of private contractors. I believe, too, if the Government can build a ship in its own yards at a little increased cost, it is well to do so, in order that it may ultimately have the trained, skilled, and competent force of men who, in emergency or in a time when the private contractor will not do the work cheaply for the Government or within the time the Government wants it done, the navy-yards may step in and relieve the Government of this embarrassment and build its ships. Even should the cost of this experiment run up somewhere near the figures named by the gentleman from Illinois, it is well to make the trial, for thereby we can get information which will settle once and for all the question of the policy to be involved hereafter.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. There are a number of members who would like to talk upon this amendment on this side of the House, and I understand there are some on that. I would suggest to my colleague from Massachusetts that we have, say, two hours of debate upon this question, one hour to be controlled by him and one hour by myself, and then take a vote——

Mr. ROBERTS. It seems to me, I will say, so far as I am concerned personally, this question has thoroughly been thrashed out in the general debate.

Mr. CANNON. But we have not said our pieces, and the gentleman has his.

Mr. ROBERTS. We are under the five-minute rule, and I think no gentleman will find any trouble in getting an extension of his time. With the number who want to speak a limit of two hours would not give more than five minutes to each.

Mr. CLAYTON. Regular order!

Mr. FOSS. I simply wanted to make the suggestion.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman would not answer my question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10782) granting a pension to Ole Steensland.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized. The regular order being called for, this will be the last speaker on this amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the shipbuilding plants in the country should not object to the test proposed by this amendment. This bill carries provision for only 6 ships, as follows: Two battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats. The contractors are now building 59 ships for the Government. We are now building under contract 8 battle ships, 6 armored cruisers, 9 protected cruisers, 4 monitors, a total of 27 war ships, and 30-odd of the smaller craft. The 27 larger ships will cost $117,000,000, and all the ships which contractors now have will probably foot up $150,000,000.

In this bill we are providing for only four large ships, and the amendment provides that two of these large ships and one gunboat shall be built in the navy-yards to secure a fair comparison. So far as I am concerned, I would be glad to see all of the four larger ships go to the navy-yards, because the contractors now have 29 battle ships, cruisers, and monitors to build. Four ships given to the navy-yards would not more than furnish us a fair comparison.

Admiral O'Neil states in regard to these battle ships now under contract by the shipbuilding plants that they will not be completed for two or three years. This is as good a time as we could have to try the experiment of building ships in the navy-yards. The private contractors have a number of them. Let us build at least one battle ship and one armored cruiser and one gunboat in the navy-yards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, something has been stated about the opinion of Admiral Bowles, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs brought in his statement that it would cost 25 per cent more in the navy-yards, and it was read for the first time during this debate.

I will read here a part of the testimony of Admiral Bowles taken before the Committee on Naval Affairs, when he could have been interrogated on all points in regard to it. I read only a few brief extracts. Admiral Bowles said, in reply to questions:

Mr. WHEELER. If I understand you correctly, it is your judgment that the service would be promoted if the Government should construct some ships in the navy-yards, regardless of cost?

Admiral BOWLES. I should not like to put it that way. I would say notwithstanding the handicap of some increased cost.

Mr. WHEELER. You spoke of the maintenance of these yards, with the ultimate view of getting them into better condition, so that in case of emergency, or otherwise, the Government would be ready to construct its ships at any time it should see proper?

Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And you stated that at such navy-yards as Norfolk and New York you are now in condition to construct ships with a few additional changes?

Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And as to the difficulties which you have suggested in the way of insurance, is it not true that the ships are now almost entirely constructed of steel?

Admiral BOWLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. Then, in your judgment, the Government can construct ships in its own navy-yards well-nigh as cheaply as ships can be constructed in private yards?

Admiral BOWLES. If it undertook it as a matter of regular practice.

Mr. WHEELER. And, in your judgment, it should do so?

Admiral BOWLES. To a limited extent; yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And the service would be promoted by reason of it?

Admiral BOWLES. I think it would, considerably.

In addition to this we have the testimony of another bureau chief, not second in importance to Admiral Bowles himself. Admiral O'Neil, of the Bureau of Ordnance, said in his hearing:

Yes; I think they can build ships now in the navy-yards as cheap as outside, because there is no question of profit; there is no question of interest on the investment, which is a great feature in private work. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of his colleague be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIXEY. Again he says: "Yes; I think we could get a better product. It may cost a little more, but it ought not to if the work is carried on conscientiously."

In addition to this Admiral O'Neil makes the statement that the navy-yard can build the ships as cheaply as the contractor. Admiral O'Neil also states, in regard to the last contracts, that the shipbuilders evidently got together on prices. I take it that he ought to know; I take it that that fact is a justification for this House to direct that the experiment shall be made by practical test so as to show what it will cost to build in the navy-yards of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been stated in the hearings that it cost $50,000 per annum to keep up the inspection at one of the private shipbuilding yards; that it costs the Government $50,000 to inspect the work which is being done there. I want to say here in regard to the intimation that was made a few days ago, that we would have to have more officers on shore if we built in the navy-yards than we have now, that I think the contrary is true, because now we have constructors, and inspectors, and draftsmen, and other assistants both in the private yards and in the navy-yards. If we built in the navy-yards we would not have to have this double corps of inspectors, draftsmen, and constructors.

Mr. Chairman, it was stated, I believe, by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a few moments ago that the experience of England was that it cost more to build in the navy-yards than in the private shipyards. The gentleman is mistaken in that statement. The opposite is true. According to witnesses before the Naval Committee it was shown that England, Russia, France, and Germany are all building, largely in some instances, more than one-half of their war ships in their navy-yards. And the statement was that England is building ships more cheaply in her navy-yards than she could build them under contract.

I charge here that the gentlemen who now say that they favor the construction of only one ship in one of our navy-yards as an experiment are the same gentlemen who favored none until they were obliged to take this, and now they fear more. The friends of the proposition for navy-yard construction favor the amendment which is for one of each. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, the proposition is so reasonable that I can not conceive that it will not be adopted by the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is not the weight of the testimony and authority in favor of the conclusion that ships can be built more cheaply, or certainly as cheap, in the navy-yards as in private yards?

Mr. RIXEY. I think the testimony to that effect is overwhelming. So far as I know, Admiral Bowles is unsupported by any other witness—any other expert witness, certainly. It is true that ex-Secretary Long expressed his opinion against building ships in the navy-yards; but so far as I know the last statement of Admiral Bowles is unsupported in any way by any of the testimony before the Naval Committee.

Mr. FOSS. Did the gentleman hear the letter which I read, a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which was part of the hearings before the committee?

Mr. RIXEY. I remember that letter.

Mr. FOSS. That was a letter which the Secretary of the Navy laid before the committee saying that the expense would be 25 per cent more in Government yards than in private establishments.

Mr. RIXEY. That is true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that Constructor Stahl and Constructor Baxter, in the hearings before the committee of the last Congress, also recommended the building of these ships in our navy-yards?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes. Now, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] I want to say that Admiral Bowles figures out the additional cost in this way:

I have also added 10 per cent to the material cost to the Government.

I ask why should it cost the Government 10 per cent more for its material than it does a contractor? The Government has the money appropriated in advance; it is in the Treasury ready to be paid out.

Mr. CLAYTON. In answer to the last question propounded, I should like to say that if it costs the Government more than it does individuals there is something wrong, "something rotten up the creek," and we ought to know about it.

Mr. RIXEY. Admiral Bowles then adds "70 per cent to the contract cost of labor, instead of 40 per cent, as given in the card." This, to my mind, is not a fair statement of the relative cost.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 15, 1902:

H. J. Res. 189. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for expenses of the dedication of the statue of Marshal de Rochambeau to be unveiled in the city of Washington.

On May 16, 1902:

H. R. 13996. An act making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service in the Republic of Cuba.

On May 17, 1902:

H. R. 7018. An act for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. FOSS. I trust not.

The question was put, and those voting in the affirmative answered.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] rise?

Mr. CANNON. I move as an amendment that the debate on this paragraph be closed at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the debate on this paragraph be closed at half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. TATE, and others addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. If gentlemen will contain themselves while the Chair states the proposition, he will be obliged. The gentleman from Illinois has moved as an amendment that all debate upon the section and the amendments thereto be closed at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point of order that we were taking the vote when the gentleman from Illinois made his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is attempting to state a point of order, and meanwhile the Chair will be obliged if the other gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the House was taking a vote when the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was made.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee wait until there is sufficient order to allow him to be heard? The Committee of the Whole will come to order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the affirmative vote on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] had been taken and the committee was dividing, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Illinois was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to make a point of order that a motion to close debate absolutely is not amendable by a motion to close debate a later time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. For the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry, and possibly a point of order. Was not the House dividing at the time the gentleman from Illinois made his motion, and are we not operating under the five-minute rule, and does it not require unanimous consent to extend the time?

Mr. CANNON. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] had been made. The Chair had asked those in favor of the motion to say "aye." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was upon his feet—the Chair did not know for what purpose. Without declaring the vote, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois to the extent of inquiring for what purpose he rose. Whereupon he stated that he rose for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Chair recognized him for that motion, for which, the Chair understood, he had been trying to get recognition all the time. This is a very common occurrence in the House and in Committee of the Whole. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York by closing debate at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I now move an amendment that debate close in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON) there were—ayes 71, noes 96.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON and Mr. FITZGERALD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes, 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to now close debate on this paragraph and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBERTS. Debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not preclude the offering of an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

It is further provided that the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, and so far as may in his judgment be practicable, direct that any or all of the vessels herein authorized be built in such navy-yards as he may designate: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one of the battle ships or one of the armored cruisers herein authorized in such navy-yard as he may designate.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is new legislation, not germane to the bill, and that it is the same thing that has been ruled out by the Chair heretofore, with the exception of one ship.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I offered the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts again state what his point of order is?

Mr. ROBERTS. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is new legislation. It violates existing law, and it is a limitation on the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state, as I understood that amendment, it is exactly what the text of the paragraph is now.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, to save time I move that the paragraph now being read and the succeeding paragraph be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that so much of the bill as is included between lines 9 and 22, inclusive, be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, let the paragraphs be read,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is further provided that the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, and so far as may in his judgment be practicable, direct that any or all of the vessels herein authorized be built in such navy-yards as he may designate: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one of the battle ships or one of the armored cruisers herein authorized in such navy-yard as he may designate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CANNON. I first move to strike out the last word. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this paragraph ought to be stricken out. Perhaps it ought to be amended. We have, in round numbers, in this country 10 navy-yards. This provision authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to build any or all of these ships in the 10 navy-yards, an important provision, because while by the amendment just adopted he must build 3 in the navy-yards, it is mandatory as to the others authorized. The private yards, perchance, might combine, and he would be at their mercy. This clause in the naval bill has always, as I recollect, so far as I recollect, been in it as a check against combination upon the part of the private yards. Therefore, in my judgment it should not be stricken out. Now, one further word.

Now, one further word. I am quite as anxious as any gentleman of this committee to protect all the labor in the United States. The ten navy-yards, some of them anxious to branch out, were in favor of the amendment adopted a little while ago. The organizations of labor about those navy-yards were anxious to have that provision adopted. It is alleged, and I think the facts show it to be the case, that the construction of ships in the navy-yards will cost more than the construction would cost if it was open to competition. If that be so, in the name of protected labor you protect one-tenth of 1 per cent of it, and you tax the 99.9 per cent who have to take the smaller wage, without pay for holidays, without leave of absence of two weeks in the year. You make them support themselves and work at the smaller wage, and then turn around and tax them for the benefit of the one-tenth of 1 per cent. I am quite willing to risk my vote touching this question upon that statement.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is an occasion when we might indulge in a few reflections with reference to the consistency of the gentlemen on the other side of this House. For the last two or three years they have upon all occasions been discussing militarism, the fear of the dominance of the military arm of this Government; and doubtless it has kept many of them awake at night, as they have had visions of the phantoms that come up before them, of the direful results that would follow when this nation of ours was dominated by the military arm of the Government.

Now, these gentlemen, in order to subserve some purpose or other, are willing to invade the domain of labor in this country. They are willing to make the Government dominate that great interest in this land. I insist that it is no part of the business of this Government, and especially no part of the business of the Navy Department, to interfere in any way with labor and labor lines in the country. Here they propose that the Government shall be one of the great employers of labor. Is that democracy? Is not that a departure from all this prating of yours during the last three or four years on this vexed question of militarism? Suppose you can do that, what can you not do? I believe that the Government of the United States ought not in any way to interpose itself as an employer of labor as against other employers of labor. It is a new function of Government. It is one that has been abandoned by the Government in the years past—abandoned because it was not a function of government and because experience has shown that it was unwise.

Do you not remember that in the old days, when the Government was the builder of its own ships, there was a ship that stood upon the stocks for seventy-one years unfinished? That is a truth. It stood upon the stocks until it rotted there, housed as it was. Every experiment of this kind that has been made has been disastrous to the interests of the Government. It has cost more money; it has interfered with labor; it has been harmful in all aspects.

I believe that the true policy of this Government is to divorce as far as possible the military part of this Government from civil affairs. I had something to say a day or two ago about the influence of the Navy in the government of the Navy and the influence of the Army in the government of the Army in the gradual usurpation of places of civil character by military personages.

I believe it is wrong, and that instead of enlarging the civil field for naval and Army officers we ought to curtail it. Instead of having in the Navy Department here more than a hundred officers engaged in the control of the Navy and in the War Department more than a hundred officers in control of the Army they ought to be sent to their proper stations rather than to attempt their own government. And I am opposed now and at all times to enlarging their field. This is a step in that direction. Who can tell, under the influences that have manifested themselves here to-day, where this will end.

I notice as a singular fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], and the gentleman from California [Mr. METCALF] are all earnest advocates of this departure; and the strange coincidence exists that each one of those gentlemen has in his immediate vicinity, to look after and to secure the political benefits of, a navy-yard whose influence he wants to extend and make still greater. Who does not remember the old political scandals that used to exist under whatever Administration we had with reference to these navy-yards—how they were used politically? Are we not liable to the same influences again? Therefore I am opposed to this.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FINLEY, Mr. CLAYTON, and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized. Debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was reported to the House it carried in it a provision that at least one battle ship or one of the armored cruisers authorized by the bill should be built in one of the navy-yards of the Government. There was no outcry then by the gentlemen on the other side who are now so much opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], which provides that one each of the battle ships, armored cruisers, and gunboats authorized by the bill to be built shall be constructed at the Government navy-yards.

Gentlemen of the committee, you have heard the debate and have the data before you, and are able to judge as to whether or not it is advisable that a trial should be given to the Government navy-yards (which cost, as I remember, about $100,000,000 for their construction and equipment) in building some of the vessels authorized by the bill. The burden of the speeches on the other side is to the effect that the amendment proposed is an attack on labor, and will necessarily result in loss of wages and injury to the laboring class. Is this true?

In the Government navy-yards the hours of labor are only eight hours a day, while in the private shipyards, where those who are opposed to this amendment would have all the vessels authorized by this bill to be built, the hours of labor are ten hours a day. The private shipyards require 25 per cent more time each day from the laborer. As I see it, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the interest of the laboring men in the Government navy-yards, and if it prevails there will be a great deal more work for them to do.

It is stated that where tests have been made, and notably in the construction of the monitors Monterey and the Monadnock, that the difference in the cost of construction in favor of the Government navy-yards amounts to about 25 per cent. The money appropriated by Congress to pay for the construction of vessels is expended largely for labor. Now, does it not follow that if vessels can be constructed at the Government navy-yards at a less cost than under the contract system, when the hours of labor in the private shipyards are 25 per cent greater, that the profit is to the contractor and the loss is to the Government and the laborer?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the contention is unfounded; that no assault is being made upon labor. The amendment is in the interest of the laboring men employed in the Government navy-yards. Many people contend that the test made in the construction of the Monterey and the Monadnock will hold good as to the construction of all vessels built in the Government yards as compared with the cost of the same vessels built by contractors at the prices heretofore paid.

The contention is that more money has been paid for the construction of ships for the Navy than should be paid. Now, I ask, first, if this contention should not be settled, and second, if there is any better way of ending the discussion than to give a fair test and an equitable trial to the navy-yards of the Government and to the shipyards of the private contractors by giving to the Government navy-yards one vessel to build of each type authorized by the bill. Can there be anything fairer than this? Can the men who own the private yards ask for more? I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will at least settle the question, and if it prevails, we can have a fair trial, and then a correct basis upon which to make estimates for the future.

The present bill will not end the construction of ships for the Navy. This will continue as long as the Government shall stand, and we will go on building up the Navy and increasing its efficiency. I am in favor of this because I believe it necessary, but I am also in favor of obtaining the most efficient work and the best results in an economical manner, doing justice alike to the Government and to those employed by it. The advocates of this amendment, I repeat, are making no war upon labor. On the contrary, they are endeavoring to do that which, from an economical point of view, will benefit the Government and be of great benefit to the laboring class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. I move to close debate upon the pending amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendments will be considered as withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "designated" on page 74, line 15, add: "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build all the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels."

Mr. BALL of Texas. I shall not make any speech in support of this amendment. It simply provides——

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman has cut his time off. Is this subject to amendment or debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri was to limit debate upon the amendments, which were pro forma amendments. It was not to limit debate upon the paragraph.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. BALL of Texas. If the gentleman will possess himself with patience, I shall not occupy more than two minutes. The object of this amendment is that in case it shall be apparent to the naval authorities that the parties who shall enter into contract for the construction of these vessels may enter into an agreement or an understanding by which competition is to be shut off, that then all the vessels shall be built in the navy-yards under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the words from line 9 to 15, inclusive, on page 74 as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out of the bill the paragraph beginning at line 9 and ending in line 15, page 74, as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for the purpose of preparing and equipping such navy-yard or navy-yards as may be so designated for the construction of such ship or ships the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for each of the navy-yards in which the Secretary of the Navy may direct any such ship or ships to be built.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, that exact language has been incorporated in an amendment, and I move that those lines from 16 to 22, inclusive, be stricken out.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby instructed to keep an accurate account of the cost of inspection and construction of such ship or ships, whether built in Government yards or by contract, and report thereon to Congress at each session the progress of work and cost thereof, including the inspection of all the material going into the construction of such ship or ships, and upon the completion thereof to report a full and detailed statement showing the relative cost of inspection and construction in Government yards and by contract.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 75, after the end of line 7, the following:

"The sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of purchasing a subsurface torpedo boat, to be constructed under the patent of Clarence L. Burger, of the city of New York, in accordance with the plans and specifications presented to the board on construction of the Navy Department by the Subsurface Torpedo Boat Company through its president, Clarence L. Burger, and one of its naval architects, Mr. Clinton Crane, of the city of New York, on the 2d of May, 1902, and upon which the said board on construction reported to the Secretary of the Navy 'that the said plans and specifications are feasible.'"

Mr. FOSS. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that as this amendment is liable to lead to debate, why not move that the committee rise?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman raises the point of order, I can not but recognize the fact that it is subject to a point of order. I do not wish to discuss it if the point of order is raised.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. FOSS. I reserve the point of order. I would like to hear the merits of the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am informed——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he did not want to discuss it.

Mr. SIBLEY. I stated, Mr. Chairman, that I did not wish to discuss the point of order. I do not consider myself competent to measure lances with the distinguished parliamentarians whom I see upon all sides of me. [Laughter.] If I could have the attention of this committee to the merits of this proposition for the next hour [laughter] I should like to go into it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would be glad if an opportunity was presented to discuss this amendment upon its merits. I think the attention of the country should be directed to the merits of this newly designed craft, which probably is one of the most valuable that has ever been called to the attention of Congress. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and that is on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois. In the form in which the amendment is presented the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the amendment which I offered, which was to the paragraph stricken out by the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, was inadvertently stricken out. Now, I ask that it be inserted as a separate section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman states that the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts was stricken out by inadvertence, and he now asks unanimous consent that it be inserted in the bill. Let the amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build all the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is an undisposed-of amendment on page 21, line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an undisposed-of matter previous to that. The provision of line 7, page 20, was passed over. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desired to amend it.

Mr. FOSS. A point of order was reserved by my colleague from Illinois, but he informs me that he does not wish to press it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think that while all the boys are getting the pork they better have this pork, but I doubt if the service requires it. I am willing that it should pass on its merits.

Mr. ROBERTS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBERTS. The point of order having been reserved on that paragraph and the gentleman from Illinois not wishing to press it, is it open for anybody else to make it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have now the information of which I spoke.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will first report the proposed amendment to the provision on page 21.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "diem" in line 17, page 21, insert "including Sundays employed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] now presents a letter, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1902.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Referring to your inquiry of to-day in regard to the pay of superintendent of teams at the New York Navy-Yard, I would state that I think it would be entirely proper to provide in the naval act for compensating him for Sundays when actually employed, he being a per diem employee.

In such case the total for civil establishment under that yard should be increased by $208.

Very truly,

MORDECAI J. ENDICOTT,
Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. CANNON. This amendment applies, as I understand, to the civil establishment at the navy-yard in New York. I believe this is a proposed change of existing law. I do not think we should encourage these "knights of the quill" in this way.

A MEMBER. No point of order was raised when the amendment was offered.

Mr. FOSS. I reserved a point of order upon it.

Mr. CANNON. I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that no point of order was reserved upon this amendment.

Mr. FOSS. I reserved a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe a point of order was reserved until the information could be obtained; but I wish the point might be withheld until I can explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, you have been so courteous on that side toward this side that, though it pains me greatly, I must insist upon the point of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] concedes that the point of order was reserved, and the gentleman from Illinois insists upon the point of order. The Chair sustains the point.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments and with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN reported the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with amendments and with the recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

Mr. FOSS. I move the previous question on the amendments and on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [A pause.] In the absence of such a demand the Chair will take the question on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Labor, House bill No. 3076, known as the eight-hour law.

The bill, with the amendments reported by the committee, was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3076) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or any Territory, or the District of Columbia, thereby securing better products, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That each and every contract hereafter made to which the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia is a party, and every such contract made for or on behalf of the United States, or any Territory, or said District, which may require or involve the employment of laborers or mechanics, shall contain a provision that no laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by the contract, in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day; and each and every such contract shall stipulate a penalty for each violation of the provision directed by this act of $5 for each laborer or mechanic, for each and every calendar day in which he shall labor more than eight hours; and any officer or person designated as inspector of the work to be performed under any such contract, or to aid in enforcing the fulfillment thereof, shall upon observation or investigation report to the proper officer of the United States, or any Territory, or the District of Columbia, all violations of the provisions in this act directed to be made in each and every such contract, and the amount of the penalties stipulated in any such contract shall be withheld by the officer or person whose duty it shall be to pay the moneys due under such contract, whether the violation of the provisions of such contract is by the contractor, his agents or employees, or any subcontractor, his agents or employees. No person on behalf of the United States, or any Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall rebate or remit any penalty imposed under any provision or stipulation herein provided for, unless upon a finding which he shall make up and certify that such penalty was imposed by reason of an error in fact.

Nothing in this act shall apply to contracts for transportation by land or water, nor shall the provisions and stipulations in this act provided for affect so much of any contract as is to be performed by way of transportation, or for such materials as may usually be bought in open market, whether made to conform to particular specifications or not. The proper officer on behalf of the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia, may waive the provisions and stipulations in this act provided for as to contracts for military or naval works or supplies during time of war or a time when war is imminent. No penalties shall be exacted for violations of such provisions due to extraordinary emergency caused by fire, or flood, or due to danger to life or loss to property. Nothing shall be construed to repeal or modify chapter 352 of the laws of the Fifty-second Congress, approved August 1, 1892, or as an attempt to abridge the pardoning power of the Executive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Was not this bill reported from the Committee on Labor with these amendments?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It was.

The SPEAKER (having put the question). In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds have voted in the affirmative. The motion of the gentleman from New Jersey is agreed to, and the bill is passed.

MINING LAWS IN SPOKANE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to suspend the rules and pass with amendments reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs the joint resolution (H. Res. 192) fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect.

The joint resolution as amended by the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That that provision in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," which relates to the subjecting to entry under the mining laws of the United States certain lands in the Spokane Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, shall not take effect and be operative until December 31, 1902.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In order that we may have some explanation of this measure, I ask for a second.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment to which this joint resolution relates having reference to the opening up of mineral lands on the Spokane Indian Reservation, was put upon the Indian appropriation act in the Senate. When the matter came up in conference, one of the Senators from the State of Washington stated to the conference committee that the conditions existing in the Spokane Reservation were identical with those in the Colville Reservation, to which we had applied the same provision a year ago.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in a note to the Senator from Washington stated that the Department had no objection to the amendment. Subsequently it developed that the allotment had not yet been made to the Indians on the reservation, and the purpose of this provision is to delay the opening of the mineral lands upon the reservation until the 1st of next January, so that in the meantime the allotments which we supposed had been made might be made. That is all there is of it. It is specially asked by the Secretary of the Interior, and it is unanimously reported by the Indian Committee after a very full discussion.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A few days ago did not the gentleman have a similar joint resolution in respect to some other section in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not present such a resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. That was in regard to section 8, and the time was extended until July 1.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Of this same bill?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Therefore we will have to pass the bill itself, and the joint resolution which the gentleman from Kansas refers to, and this joint resolution of the gentleman from New York before we get it passed and the bill signed.

Mr. CURTIS. The President will sign the bill as soon as this resolution is passed. The conferees were clearly misled in this. The House conferees hung out against the amendment until it was stated to them that the allotments had been made, and until a letter was obtained from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and it was not developed until Friday night——

Mr RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not resisting this resolution, but I want to understand if it would be necessary to pass two joint resolutions after a bill is passed in order to make the bill intelligible.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, the bill was intelligible without that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not necessary to pass two joint resolutions to make the bill intelligible. The conferees had been misled by misstatements, unintentional, I assume—I have no sort of doubt but what they were unintentional—as to the facts, and having passed something in which we find an error before it is too late to correct it, we simply ask to correct it in this way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to suggest also that the land of this reservation has not yet been surveyed even.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have not been allotted and of course they could not be surveyed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York, which is to suspend the rules and pass the House joint resolution with amendments.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

NATIONAL SANITARIUM AT HOT SPRINGS, S. DAK.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill with amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a national sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota.

Be it enacted, etc., That $150,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the erection of a national sanitarium for disabled volunteer soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota, which shall be erected by and under the direction of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which sanitarium, when in a condition to receive members, shall be subject to such rules, regulations, and restrictions as shall be provided by said Board of Managers: Provided, That such sanitarium shall be erected on land donated to the United States by the people of Hot Springs, S. Dak., and accompanied with a deed of perpetual lease to one or more of the medical or hot springs for the use of the above-named sanitarium, the location and area of the land and springs of hot water to be selected by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or such persons as they may appoint to make the selection of location and hot springs, and that exclusive jurisdiction shall be vested in said Board of Managers over the premises occupied by said sanitarium as over other realty held by said board until further enactment by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated, to be used for the transportation to and from said sanitarium of such patients as may be ordered to said sanitarium by said Board of Managers and for equipping and maintaining said sanitarium, subject to the aforesaid rules and regulations of said Board of Managers: Provided, That any member of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers who shall be certified to said sanitarium by the medical and legal authorities of said Board of Managers shall be admitted and treated thereat until discharged therefrom or returned to some Branch of the National Home by order of said Board of Managers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The second is demanded by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee; and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. MARTIN, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, as tellers. The gentlemen will please take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 3.

Accordingly a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee to twenty minutes for debate. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been pending before Congress now for four terms. It proposes to establish a sanitarium in connection with the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The bill as originally prepared designated it as a branch of the National Home. The purpose of the bill from the start has been a national sanitarium. The amendments offered simply change the phraseology of the bill from a national Home or branch Home to a sanitarium. The way in which that got in that form in the first place was by the recommendation of General Franklin, then one of the board of managers. The bill as now amended corresponds with the original intention of the act.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In the amendments which the gentleman proposes, I ask him if the amount appropriated for this hospital or sanitarium is $150,000?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, is it contemplated by the terms of the act that this shall be a hospital and that $150,000 shall construct it?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir. I may say in that connection that the bill provides that the site for the sanitarium, and also one of the medicinal or hot springs, must be furnished by the people of the place free of charge to the Government. The $150,000 must go entirely into the construction of buildings, and it is estimated that they can house 500 patients with that amount.

Mr. CANNON. And it is not contemplated by this legislation that there shall be a larger expenditure than $150,000?

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir; with the sole exception of $20,000, which is provided in this bill for maintenance.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; for maintenance, but not for additional construction.

Mr. MARTIN. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. The $150,000 is to finish it?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; that is the purpose of the bill. Now, I will say that this bill has four times passed the Senate, in four different Congresses. It has been twice reported in this House from the Military Committee, and this time unanimously.

The overcrowded condition of the various Homes of the country, and the further fact that it has been discovered and known for years that something like 50 per cent or nearly half of the old soldiers in the National Homes are afflicted with rheumatism and kindred troubles, early attracted the attention of the Board of Managers to this proposition.

An experiment was made by the Board of Managers in the sending of a number of members of the National Home at Leavenworth in 1893 to this place. The worst cases of rheumatism were selected. The surgeon and the committee appointed for the purpose of examination report that of the 30 cases sent there, 44 per cent were absolutely cured, completely cured in a period of sixty days, and others very materially improved.

From that time forth the Grand Army of the Republic and the managers of the Soldiers' Homes in various parts of the country have urged this bill upon the attention of Congress. The Grand Army of the Republic, in national encampment at Cincinnati in 1898, unanimously passed a resolution urging upon Congress the passage of this bill. From that time the Grand Army has kept a committee in the field, appointed from year to year, to advocate the bill. Although it has passed the Senate four times, it has now for the first time received the attention of the House.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that during last month General Torrance, the commander in chief of the National Grand Army of the Republic, visited Hot Springs. He has, as recently as the 12th of April, written a letter in which in the most cordial and positive way he urges Congress to pass this act and from personal inspection testifies to the efficacy of these waters in the cure of these cases.

General Torrance's letter is dated Minneapolis, Minn., April 12, 1902. He says:

I have just returned from a trip to the Hot Springs, South Dakota, where I went to personally examine the place as to its suitableness for the location of a sanitarium for the benefit of the surviving Union soldiers of the civil war.

I was accompanied by Mrs. Torrance and my daughter, and while the weather was somewhat against us we were more than pleased with what we saw, and I have no hesitancy in indorsing the strongest recommendations that have been made as to the suitableness of the place for such a sanitarium and the efficacy of the climate and the springs to alleviate and in many cases heal diseases common to our aged and unfortunate comrades.

This project has been indorsed over and over again by the national encampments of the Grand Army of the Republic and by a great many departments, including Colorado, Wyoming, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, and North and South Dakota. The Senate has passed the bill four times, and, as I am informed, it has received the unanimous vote of the Military Committee of several Congresses.

We have in our Minnesota Soldiers' Home a great many inmates who would, I am sure, be greatly benefited if a national sanitarium was established at the Hot Springs, and it seems to me that with the expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money a vast amount of good could be done to those who should receive our prompt and kindest consideration.

The plan is that from the Home at Leavenworth and the Home at Milwaukee and also from other Homes patients shall be sent who are most seriously afflicted with rheumatism, and receive care and attention there and be cured wherever possible.

I have studied the situation, so far as it relates to Leavenworth, and I find that 1,025 patients have been treated during the past twelve months for rheumatism. Some of them have been relieved, others are constantly in course of treatment and suffering.

Now, remember that for the next few years this Government sanitarium quite probably will be supplied with its patients from this Home, and many of them may be cured, which would be a saving of a large expense to the Government, besides contributing to the comfort of the old soldiers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is this sanitarium only to be used for soldiers or sailors?

Mr. MARTIN. It is to be used for the soldiers and sailors—veterans of the wars of the country, including the Spanish war.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The soldiers and sailors and veterans, and not in any sense to be a public sanitarium?

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No compensation to anybody?

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir. The sanitarium will be maintained by the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the views of the gentleman in stating that this will be a saving to the Government. I am in favor of the project. But I want to state to the gentleman an instance where I was compelled to get quarters for a soldier of my district 200 miles away or to the Soldiers' Home of Illinois, though we have a large and splendid Soldiers' Home at Marion, Ind., 40 miles away from my home and from the home of the soldiers. We had to go to the Home in Illinois to be provided with quarters by reason of the overcrowded condition of the Homes at Marion, Ind., and Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to the gentleman that I have investigated as to the capacity and membership of the various branches of the National Home.

Col. Thomas T. Knox, inspector of National Home, in his report of December 7, 1901, referring to the combined membership of the eight Branches of the National Home, states as follows:

Population.—The total number of members, present and absent, at the several Branches of the Home on June 30, 1901, was 26,441, of whom 18,859 were present and 7,582 were absent. As compared with the same date of the preceding year there was a gain at four Branches and a loss of four; but the gains exceeded the losses by 902, which represents the net gain in membership. The largest gain was at the new Danville Branch, followed in order by the Pacific, Western, and Eastern Branches. Taking the average number of members on the rolls for the year and the total is reported as 26,290.

Of this number 20,011 was the average present and 6,277 the average absent, and there was a total of 31,884 members cared for. The gain in the average present during the past year as compared with the preceding year was 786, and there was also a gain of 1,154 in the total number cared for. The maximum number present was reported as 21,414 and the minimum as 17,981, thus giving an extreme range of 3,433 members.

At date of inspection the civilian employees numbered 369, consisting of 273 males and 96 females. As compared with the previous year, this is an increase of 31 males and a decrease of 5 females, being a net gain of 26 employees. As the age and bodily infirmities of the inmates increase the number able to do any kind of work will necessarily diminish, and this will necessitate the employment of civilians in constantly increasing numbers.

Housing.—The records show a total of 120 barracks at the several Branches, and so far as reported they are occupied at all of the Branches but one by more members than they were originally intended for. The exception is at the most recently established Branch at Danville, where there is room for more occupants. The average number of occupants per barrack in excess of what they were originally intended for ranges from 4 at the Central Branch to 74 at the Pacific. At another Branch each barrack has an excess of 46 members, and at still another there is an average excess of 17 occupants. Nearly all of the barracks have basements, and at three of the Branches some of the basements are used for sleeping purposes by the members.

The number of members sleeping in places other than dormitories is reported as 2,128, or about 10 per cent of the number constantly present. Of this number, 1,215 were sleeping in attics, 472 in basements, 41 on floors, and 400 in other places not intended for that purpose. At the dates of inspection all but the Central Branch had vacant beds in barracks, the aggregate being reported as 627, and ranging from 22 at the Eastern to 310 at the Southern Branch. Generally these beds were retained for men who were absent on furlough and those sick in hospital, and will doubtless be all occupied as the winter season approaches and the furlough men return.

The average number of members of the National Home for the year 1891 was 17,528, and for 1901, 26,255, showing an increase in ten years of 8,727, or an average yearly increase of 872. The increase for 1901, as shown by the report of Colonel Knox, was 902. The gain in the average number present in the Home for the past three years is as follows: 1899, 290; 1900, 382; 1901, 786; showing that the gain in the average number present last year more than doubled. This demonstrates that as the members grow older they are absent on furlough less, and that the full daily capacity of the Home is more and more taxed to its limit.

The probable number of survivors of the Union Army and Navy in the war of the rebellion on June 30 for a series of years is estimated in a table prepared by Col. F. C. Ainsworth, Chief Record and Pension Office, War Department, as follows:

1902	930,380	1910	626,231
1903	894,585	1915	429,727
1904	858,002	1920	251,727
1905	820,687	1925	116,073
1906	782,722	1930	37,033
1907	744,196	1935	6,296
1908	705,197	1940	340
1909	665,832	1945	0

When we remember that as these veterans of the war advanced in years a large proportion of them must seek the privileges of the National Home, it is not unreasonable to consider that the membership of the Home will inevitably increase for the next twenty years. This conclusion is the more assured from the fact that provision must be made for caring for disabled soldiers from the Spanish war. Under the recent decision of the Board of Managers to admit soldiers from the Spanish war temporarily and conditionally, 343 of these men had already been admitted to the several Branches of the Home at the time of the official inspection by Colonel Knox in 1901.

Of the survivors of the war of the rebellion, estimated as of date June 30, 1902, at 930,380, it is estimated that practically 200,000 reside in the States and Territories between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains. In all this vast territory there is but one Branch of the National Home, known as the "Western Branch," located near Leavenworth, Kans. This Branch has been for years in an overcrowded condition. The membership on June 30, 1900, was 3,424, and on June 30, 1901, was 3,601, showing an increase during the year of 177. Of this number, 296 at time of last inspection were sleeping in places other than dormitories, 256 sleeping in basements, and 40 in other unsuitable places.

It is true that the Branch Home now being constructed in Tennessee will provide for the increasing membership east of the Mississippi River for a time, but it is doubtful whether the capacity of the entire National Home will not be overcrowded before there will be any material decline in membership.

But the important fact is that in our entire system of National Homes we have no sanitarium where our disabled soldiers can have the benefit of natural medicinal springs for the cure of rheumatism and kindred diseases. The location named in this bill possesses advantages that can not elsewhere be acquired—advantages provided by nature and so rare in their combination that they are duplicated in only a few instances in the world.

Hot Springs is situated in the mountain region in the southwestern portion of South Dakota at an elevation of 3,400 feet above sea level. It is in a sheltered valley on the southern slope of the Black Hills Range, a branch of the Rocky Mountains. The surroundings are attractive and beautiful. The climate is healthful and entirely free from malaria. It is the site of the State Soldiers' Home of South Dakota, and is already a noted health and pleasure resort.

There are in our National Home thousands of men who are kept there solely because they are afflicted with rheumatism. Hundreds of these may be cured annually and discharged from the Government's care to follow the pursuits of civil life for some years to come. This would be a great saving to the Government. Inspector-General Averell, who investigated this subject thoroughly, estimated that such a sanitarium at Hot Springs would in this manner pay for itself in five years.

But higher and more humane considerations urge the passage of this bill. From the earliest period in our history the valor of the American soldier in time of war has purchased for us the conditions of peace under which the political institutions of the Republic have been established and developed, and the industries of the country have realized their marvelous growth. We can never fully pay the debt of gratitude we owe the veterans of our wars. An opportunity is here afforded to add something to the number of their years and to relieve them from pain and suffering brought on by diseases contracted, in many instances, by exposure endured while fighting the battles of the nation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the Committee on Military Affairs reported two bills, one for a sanitarium or Soldiers' Home at Deadwood and the other for a Soldiers' Home at Denver, Colo. I wish to say that, in my judgment, a soldiers' home at Denver would be one of the best selections that could possibly be made and far better than the location now being considered, and I am sorry that the gentleman from South Dakota receives the recognition and the gentleman from Colorado does not.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have no word of complaint against the gentlemen from South Dakota. They are doing their best in getting some recognition for the great West, and I will vote in favor of this measure. [Loud applause.] I want to call attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that there is no Soldiers' Home in that vast domain extending from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, except one on the Pacific coast and one in the valley of the Missouri River; although more than 20,000 soldiers live within a radius of 400 miles from Denver, and the climatic conditions of Colorado are such that the building of a Home there would be of inestimable advantage compared to the Soldiers' Homes that have been constructed in other parts of the United States.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported my bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and again reported it this Congress. I hope, Mr. Speaker, to continue to press my measure until I do get recognition in behalf of the same. I feel that the place for a Soldier's Home in that broad portion of the United States is somewhere in that State, where the soldiers that are afflicted in later life with pulmonary diseases may go and by the mere being there may be cured and end their days in a condition free from pain. I feel that there ought to be a Home there. But I want to say that I can not play dog in the manger and that I have no objection to this measure, and will vote for it, and in every way expedite its passage. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MADDOX. Why is it you can not get recognition for your bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know.

Mr. MADDOX. Have you asked for it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think we have as favorable a place for a Soldiers' Home as any place in the United States.

Mr. MADDOX. But, I say, have you asked for it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have.

Mr. SULZER. How many times? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Speaker treated me very frankly. He said he would consider the matter. [Laughter.] He wanted information as to the number of Homes——

Mr. CLAYTON. He said you were a good boy! [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. He has not said he would not recognize me, and I am in hopes he will recognize me yet. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Illinois want some time?

Mr. CANNON. Just a minute or two.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I should have opposed this proposition for Mammoth Hot Springs, S. Dak., in the shape it passed the Senate. Under its provisions it would have been quite competent for the Board of Managers to construct a Home with capacity for 5,000 people. The bill has been so amended as to cover a sanitarium, and the intention expressed is that the $150,000 is to complete the sanitarium, and that is all the expenditure contemplated.

I would have no objection to a complete Home, with a holding capacity of two or three or four thousand people, at Mammoth Hot Springs, if it needed it. Now, then, I want to call attention just a moment to another thing. I did not think a complete Home was needed at Mammoth Hot Springs. It is a sparse settlement, and not a large soldier population there or elsewhere. At any rate the people who go there will be people east of the Mississippi River or that locality.

Now, then, there is much room already in the Homes already completed that is not occupied. The Home in Tennessee about which the various Grand Army posts were exceedingly anxious, from the standpoint of health and also pulmonary trouble, was authorized a year ago, and it is now in the process of construction. When complete it will care for 3,000 people. I am satisfied that with the completion of that Home and the building of this sanitorium that in the future, unless we have further war, which I trust we will not have, the capacity of the various Homes is ample to care for the people entitled to admission.

Mr. SHAFROTH. According to that the gentleman from Illinois wants to exclude me entirely. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would prefer to vote for a mint or something of that kind that Colorado really needs [laughter], because this I do not think she does need.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill and amendments were passed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield a moment to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to print for my colleague in this matter of the sanitarium, and also for myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that he and his colleague may be permitted to print remarks in the RECORD upon the bill that has just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Hon. O. H. PLATT, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, designated by the President pro tempore to perform the duties of the Chair during his temporary absence, be empowered to sign as Acting President pro tempore the enrolled bills and joint resolutions coming from the House of Representatives for presentation to the President of the United States, and that the President be notified hereof.

COMPILATION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. STEWART, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to have prepared for the use of the Senate a compilation of all treaties, laws, and Executive orders now in force relating to Indian affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is pending, proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution the following:

But no extra expense shall be allowed for any work covered by this resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior has recommended for several years a compilation of treaties and Executive orders. Such a compilation has not been made, I think, since about 1870. There is great labor in disposing of any one of the cases before the committee. The committee have had to search specially with regard to almost every question that comes up and the information is scattered through many books, the legislation having taken place generally in an appropriation bill, and then in laws ratifying agreements, and it is an exceedingly great labor. Certainly this compilation ought to be made, and it ought to be thoroughly indexed and well done. If it is not it will be useless. It can not be done for nothing. We shall have to pay for it. I think the committee will scrutinize it and will not pay more than the work is worth. I do not propose to have any kind of a job in it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I offered the amendment yesterday to the resolution of the Senator from Nevada because it has been my observation that pretty much everything of this kind in the way of a special collection of statutes relating to a particular matter has resulted in the clerk of some committee dumping together all the statutes, all the Executive orders, and pretty much everything pertaining to the bureau or department or the subject, and instead of being a work of advantage to anybody it only adds confusion to confusion. It has become almost a practice, there is so much of it done, of eking out the pay of clerks who are already well paid by providing them with these little jobs, that it ought to be stopped.

I can understand that on this subject, pertaining to all the treaties with the Indians and the action of the Department upon them, a good, well-edited, well-indexed document might be very valuable, and the index is the most valuable part of it all. Half of the works that have been prepared heretofore under resolutions of this kind have no index at all, and of those that have indexes they are very poor and afford no light to anyone; they do not cut short the work which they were intended to do, and they are useless. Any Senator who looks at such a book once never looks at it again.

If I do not insist on this amendment (because the Senator says that unless there can be some small extra expense it can not be done) it is with the assurance of the Senator that he will see to it. He has had great experience in the Indian Bureau and on these subjects, and is an old lawyer and in the habit of going to reports and statutes for citations and for information. I should like to have the Senator's assurance that he will look after this matter personally. I do not expect him to do the clerical work, but to see that it is done in a good businesslike, methodical fashion. Otherwise we shall have another of these dumping performances, everything huddled together and good for nothing.

I wish to know if the Senator is prepared to say that he will look after this work. Moreover, before any bill is brought in here to pay for it the work ought to be submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the index ought to be submitted to him, so that he may know whether it is to be a book that will be of value not only to us, but to him. If the Senator will give me the assurance that all this shall be done before any bill is presented here, I will withdraw the amendment; and unless he gives me that assurance I shall insist upon its adoption.

Mr. STEWART. I shall certainly present no bill here unless the compilation is accurate and well indexed and has the approval of the Interior Department. I will bring it before the committee. I realize the force of what the Senator has said with regard to many of these publications. I have referred to them and found them entirely useless and too cumbersome. If we can not get something that will be useful I shall not give my consent to the payment for any paper that is prepared.

Mr. HALE. The work has not been already prepared?

Mr. STEWART. There has been some work done, but it has not been prepared.

Mr. HALE. It is not completed?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will look after that himself?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. There has been some work done by clerks and by other persons, parts of which can be taken and made useful. The work is not completed, and it can not be completed for some time to come. We shall have it for another session of Congress, I hope.

Mr. HALE. Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the resolution be read; and let us see if it covers just what it ought, and no more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to have prepared for the use of the Senate a compilation of all treaties, laws, and Executive orders now in force relating to Indian affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PER DIEM SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 12th day of the present month the Committee on Pensions gave a hearing to certain gentlemen who appeared in behalf of the bill (S. 1890) granting per diem service pensions to honorably discharged officers and enlisted men of the Union Army in the civil war. The committee have had the usual number of copies of the hearing printed under the law, which I think is 50, and as there is a great demand for it I now ask that 500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire that 500 copies shall be printed for the use of the committee or as a Senate document?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it would be better to have them printed for the use of the committee. However, some number ought to go to the document room. I would inquire if the usual number might not be printed for the use of the document room and 500 additional copies for the Committee on Pensions.

The order was reduced to writing, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 additional copies of the hearing before the Committee on Pensions relating to per diem service pensions be printed for the use of the Committee on Pensions.

SPOKANE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution in relation to the Indian appropriation bill which has come from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives; which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 192) fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That that provision in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," which relates to the subjecting to entry under the mining laws of the United States certain lands in the Spokane Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, shall not take effect and be operative until December 31, 1902.

Mr. STEWART. Instead of passing our joint resolution, the House of Representatives have sent us an independent resolution, which it is necessary should be passed now. I therefore ask that it may be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3076) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or any Territory, or the District of Columbia, thereby securing better products, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in a colloquy which occurred in the Senate a few days since, while this bill was under consideration, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, felicitated himself with the statement that he had made a most complete and exhaustive explanation to the Senate of the provisions of the pending bill. The self-gratulation of the Senator went to the extent of broadly implying that if there was anything not understood in the bill that fact was due to the fault, or deficiency rather, of the one who heard and not from lack of clear and exhaustive explanation on the part of the one who spoke.

At the risk, Mr. President, of falling under this criticism of the honorable Senator, I desire to call attention to some few things connected with or involved in this bill relative to which I think one would search in vain in the speech of the Senator to find any explanation. I say that not only after having heard the speech of the Senator, but after having read it very carefully since its publication. The Senator in the course of his speech said:

The main object of the bill, Mr. President, is, in a word, to replace military by civil government—to advance civil government.

The fact to which I wish to call attention in connection with that declaration on the part of the honorable Senator is that there is now civil government in part in the Philippine Islands, organized under the authority of the war power, which, with the exception of the right to grant permanent franchises and to dispose of lands and the timber thereon and the minerals therein, is, with one or two other exceptions of a trifling nature, full in all the powers which are conferred or sought to be conferred by this bill.

It is true that that is a civil government organized under the war power. In addition there is also upon the statute book to-day a law, which we commonly know as the Spooner law—although it was adopted ultimately as an amendment, we speak of it as the Spooner law—which in all of its particulars and in all of its powers, with the one or two trifling exceptions that I shall mention hereafter, is as full and complete as the bill now sought to be enacted into law, excepting only the provisions with reference to the disposition of lands, or timber thereon and the minerals therein, and the granting of franchises in the islands.

The Senator from Massachusetts further said in the same connection and on the same page of his speech that in the framing of this bill the utmost pains were taken "that there should be no opportunity given for undue or selfish exploitation," speaking of the islands. The particular point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate in this connection is that the only difference of a material character between the civil government now organized in part in the islands under the war power and the powers proposed to be given to the Government in this bill is that in the present civil government there is not the power for the exploitation of the islands, and that in the proposed law there is the power for the exploitation of the islands.

I desire to call attention further, Mr. President, because it is still more important, that in the Spooner amendment, which is now the law, are found all the powers sought to be conferred by the proposed law, except that under the special law there can be no exploitation of the islands, but that in the proposed law there can be their unlimited exploitation.

The Senator said that there were two purposes in the framing of this bill which it is proposed to make law, first, to authorize civil government; second, to prevent undue exploitation. It is beyond the possibility of dispute that it does not enlarge the scope of civil government except in the one particular which the Senator says it was intended to guard against, to wit, the furnishing of the opportunity for the exploitation of the properties of the islands.

It is in the lands of a country, in the timber of a country, in the minerals of a country, and in the franchises of a thousand kinds in a country that there are found the opportunities for exploitation. Under the law as it now exists, under which civil government has been organized under the war power, there is no opportunity for exploitation of a permanent character. Under the civil law as it exists upon the statute books—to wit, the Spooner law—there is no opportunity for the exploitation of these resources, but under the proposed law, I repeat, there is every opportunity for its exploitation.

It occurs to me, sir, that the Senator from Massachusetts might have employed some of his time, of which there has been a superabundance, in explaining to the Senate and to the country why it is that there should be such urgency for the passage of a bill, such imperative demand for the passage of a bill, when the only difference of a practical or material character between the law as it will stand after the bill is passed and the law as it now stands is that opportunities will be afforded for exploitation which do not now exist.

Mr. President, the opportunities for exploitation in this bill are very much greater than I imagine Senators generally think. For instance, in conversation with Senators who occupy the Republican side of this Chamber I have had them to frankly admit to me that they thought the provision in the bill which gave to corporations the right to acquire 5,000 acres of land and limiting individuals to 160 was wrong, and yet I imagine that very few of those Senators, possibly not any of them, realize the fact that there is not even the limitation of 5,000 acres on corporations in the bill, but that it is unlimited, and that a corporation under the bill can get 1,000,000 acres as easily as it can get 5,000 acres.

Well, Mr. President, I will read and see. The 5,000-acre limitation, unless I have read it very incorrectly, and, if so, I shall certainly admit it as frankly and as freely as I now state it—the 5,000-acre limitation is upon the temporary disposition of land, which shall be made pending the ordaining of the permanent regulations under which the public domain is to be disposed of.

Section 11 of the bill reads as follows:

That the government of the Philippines, subject to the provisions of this act and except as hereinafter provided, shall make rules and regulations for the lease, sale, or other disposition of the public lands other than timber or mineral lands, but such rules and regulations shall not go into effect or have the force of law until they have received the approval of the President, by and through the Secretary of War, and they shall also be submitted to Congress—

Quite an afterthought, apparently—and unless disapproved or amended by Congress at the next ensuing session after their submission they shall at the close of such session have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands when they shall have received the approval of the President, as hereinbefore provided.

There is no limitation there. It is a broad, unlimited grant to the Philippine Commission, subject to the approval of the President, to make any rules and regulations with reference to the disposition of the public domain, without any limitation as to quantity or as to the terms upon which that disposition shall be made.

That is the provision of the bill. Now, let me read the succeeding section in order to show that there is no intention to limit it. It may have been an oversight on the part of the committee, but certainly there is nothing expressed in the bill which I have been able to find to indicate an intention to limit it.

SEC. 12. That the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized and empowered to enact rules and regulations and to prescribe terms and conditions to enable persons to perfect their title to public lands not exceeding 160 acres or its equivalent in hectares, who, prior to the transfer of sovereignty from Spain to the United States, had fulfilled all or some of the conditions required by the Spanish laws and royal decrees of the Kingdom of Spain for the acquisition of legal title thereto yet failed to secure conveyance of title; and the President of the United States is authorized, upon the recommendation of the Philippine Commission, to issue patents, without compensation, to any native of the Philippine Islands, conveying title to any tract of land not more than 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares, which had been actually occupied by such native or his ancestors prior to the 13th of August, 1898.

Mr. President, that is the full and complete provision with reference to the permanent disposition of lands in this connection. There may be in some part of the bill out of its ordinary place something which limits it, but there is nothing in the proper place which limits it. If there is anything else I should be glad to have it pointed out.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator has evidently made a very close examination of the bill, and that he is very familiar with its limitations. I can see that by the way he is analyzing it, but will he kindly read section 77.

Mr. BACON. I will, with pleasure; but I will state, Mr. President, that I do not profess to be as familiar with it as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. That section limits corporations absolutely; and, if the Senator will kindly read it, it may throw some light on the situation.

Mr. BACON. I want to say, in reply to the learned and honorable Senator, that I do not claim to have made an exhaustive examination of the bill. I am not on the committee. But, Mr. President, when this bill was presented to the Senate, before a word was said upon it, when the Senator presented it, I asked him to make an explanation of the bill, and he declined to do it, and stated that he had no explanation to make except the report of the committee. When he did ultimately undertake to make the explanation, I repeat he felicitated himself and the Senate upon the explanation, which was exhaustive and complete; but he made no word of mention as to this important matter. So that if I am not informed it is the fault of the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is undertaking to instruct the Senate. I did not suppose he was waiting on me. He is talking about the bill as if he understood it thoroughly, and he has left out one of the most important sections.

Mr. BACON. In the first sentence I uttered was that the Senator had expressed his very great pleasure to the Senate in a recent colloquy that he had explained this bill so thoroughly and so exhaustively that if it was not understood by everybody it was the fault of the party who failed to understand it. I was calling attention to a very important matter, upon which I thought we ought to have had the explanation of the Senator; and we are getting that explanation now for the first time.

Mr. LODGE. I am not making any explanation. I am simply calling attention to a provision in the bill which any Senator who had read the bill would have seen in section 77. I did suppose that before discussing the bill the Senator would read it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. In section 77 of the bill there is a limitation upon the amount of land that any corporation may hold; but I call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that so far as the limitation is concerned it is wholly nugatory, as has been demonstrated time out of mind in dealing with corporations in this country where limitations of that character have existed.

Mr. LODGE. That is a different proposition of the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I am going to stand on the original proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. That is a different proposition, I contend. There is an absolute limitation in section 77. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] puts a different interpretation upon it. I will read the section.

Mr. BACON. I have it before me, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I hope the Senator will read it. He evidently has not heretofore read it.

Mr. BACON. I will read it; and I say the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken. If I read the section correctly, there is no limitation of any corporation to 5,000 acres of land except a corporation engaged in agriculture.

Mr. LODGE. Any other corporation not engaged in agriculture is limited to the actual amount of land needed for their purposes, and all such laws are drawn in that way.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has called my attention to section 77 of this bill, which he says is a limitation upon all corporations in the Philippines holding land. I will read it and see whether or not it is. I stated that it was a limitation upon corporations holding land for the purpose of agriculture. Here is section 77:

SEC. 77. That no corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate or be permitted to hold or own real estate except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it is created—

Now, Mr. President, there is practically a complete sentence; and I will pass on and subsequently return to that—and every corporation authorized to engage in agriculture shall by its charter be restricted to the ownership and control of not to exceed 5,000 acres of land; and this provision shall be held to prevent any corporation engaged in agriculture from being in anywise interested in any other corporation engaged in agriculture. Corporations, however, may loan funds on real-estate security and purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title. Corporations not organized in the Philippine Islands, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

That is the section. I am very glad that most of those whom I address are lawyers. Will any lawyer say that there are more than two limitations in that section as to the amount of land which shall be held by a corporation? In the case of agricultural corporations there is an express limitation of 5,000 acres.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is complete.

Mr. BACON. That is complete. But as to all other corporations there is no limitation except that which may be found in the domain of reason.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is a lawyer of learning and distinction. I ask the Senator whether he thinks the limitation in the first sentence of the section, which ends with the word "created," in line 22, is not a limitation such as the Senator himself would draw in limiting the holdings of land by a corporation, such as a manufacturing or any other corporation, except an agricultural one, to only the land necessary for its buildings and operations?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the question of what shall be the amount of land necessary for the purposes of a corporation depends altogether upon what are the purposes of the corporation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. And we have these days some very expansive purposes. We have a corporation here now that has for its purposes the ownership of all the steel-producing plants in this country. According to the purposes of that corporation, if that be the only limitation, if the only limitation is that which is reasonably within the purposes of the corporation, this steel corporation would be authorized to hold every steel plant in the United States, because that is the purpose of the corporation.

Now, Mr. President, suppose there was chartered a corporation organized for the purpose of holding all the mineral lands in the Philippine Islands—you may say that would be an unreasonable expectation, but still it is not an impossible one—if a corporation should be organized, which would certainly be an infant compared to the great steel corporation in point of size, if such a corporation should be organized and authorized to hold all the mineral lands in the Philippine Islands, would not that be within the purview of that corporation?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator if, in his extensive corporation practice as a lawyer, he ever heard of a corporation which was chartered and specifically authorized to hold all the mineral lands in any State or Territory?

Mr. BACON. Whether I did or not matters not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The proposition is, if the Senator will permit an interruption, an impossible proposition; but take as an illustration the steel trust, of which he speaks. I will ask him whether, as a lawyer, he thinks under the first limitation here, if the steel trust were operating under the first limitation, the steel trust could be permitted, for instance, to buy a farm of a thousand acres of land?

Mr. BACON. I do not think that is a pertinent question, because it is something outside of the proposition we are discussing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is just the point. This limitation limits the holding of land by other than agricultural corporations to the land necessary for their business; and, therefore, the Senator admits that the steel trust could not buy a farm of 1,000 acres or 10,000 acres of land, because that would be outside of its business. So if the steel trust existed in the Philippine Islands it could own under this limitation, according to what the Senator now says, only such lands as would be necessary for its plant, and that is precisely the point of limitation.

Mr. BACON. I do not think the explanation of the Senator explains.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator another question, with his permission.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me after asking such a long, intricate, and involved question to make some reply.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not know the Senator was going to make a reply. I understood him to say that the question was not pertinent, and so I thought I would put another question by way of illustration.

Mr. BACON. I was going to reply anyway, because courtesy demanded that I should do so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator is not disposed to answer an application of his own illustration, I should like to make another illustration.

Mr. BACON. Go ahead.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose a manufacturing corporation were to exist in the Philippine Islands and was incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing cigars, we will say, or cotton, or anything else, does the Senator, as a lawyer, think that under the first limitation of section 77 such a corporation as that could be permitted to buy and own a farm of 1,000 acres?

Mr. BACON. Most distinctly not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or any other land except such as is necessary for its factories?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is true, is it not also true that there is a very definite and clear limitation in the first part of this section, which the Senator says is unlimited?

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator is through——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, I am through.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the proposition is too plain. Of course a corporation is bound in its acts by the limitations of its charter. If it is chartered for the purpose of manufacturing cigars, outside of this particular limitation it would have no right to go into the farming business, and with this limitation there would certainly be no opportunity for it to do so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So there is a limitation?

Mr. BACON. Nor if there were a charter to any other manufacturing corporation would there be any power for it to engage in any other business than that, except such incidental business as was essential to the purposes of its creation. But the point I am after, and which goes clear beyond the question of the learned Senator, is this: that there may be corporations which are not mere manufacturing corporations, and there may be corporations which are not sugar-refining corporations or any other corporations in the manufacturing line; they may be corporations for mining purposes, and if——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; go ahead.

Mr. BACON. And if for mining purposes—of course, if they were able to obtain a charter sufficiently expansive to cover all the islands—they would have a right to own all the lands in the islands upon which minerals might be found, according to their charter, would they not?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Taking the illustration of a mining corporation, supposing a mining corporation were incorporated for the purpose of mining, would it, under this limitation, be authorized to buy a thousand acres of agricultural land for farming purposes?

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President; not to go into the business of farming.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, Mr. President; but would they be authorized to buy a thousand acres of timber land for mining purposes?

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that the Senator thinks, after all, this is a limitation in section 77.

Mr. BAILEY. They might need timber with which to conduct their mining operations, and would they not then have the right to buy timber land?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] a question, then.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will confine all of his inquiries to me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will be delighted to follow the suggestion, and ask the Senator from Georgia, or the two Senators, whether or not, under the first limitation in section 77, a mining corporation would be permitted to acquire any more timber land than was necessary for the conduct of its mining operations?

Mr. BACON. I am going to exclude the question of timber.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will excuse me, I should like first to answer the question of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

I exclude all these incidentals which, of course, we all recognize as entirely within the proper range of consideration, but, for the purposes of simplification, I exclude them, and exclude all other uses of the land except those specified in the charter of a mining corporation, for instance, which is mining, and I say that a company which has a charter to hold all the mineral lands in the Philippine Islands is authorized to go forward and buy any land in which it may reasonably understand mineral to exist, and if it be 1,000,000 acres or 10,000,000 acres, under the purview of this bill and its limitations, it can hold that much land.

Now, I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I had no objection in the world to yielding to the Senator, but I desired before yielding to him to answer one at a time. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I will put my question to another member of the committee.

Mr. BACON. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I will not trouble the Senator at this time.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that, as I understand the provisions of this bill, timber and mineral lands are exempted from the general provisions upon which the Senator has been commenting. So that there can not be the case of a corporation acquiring mineral lands to the extent indicated, and I can not think of any other kind of a corporation that could legitimately acquire land for the purposes of its business.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if there is anything to prevent the same persons from organizing themselves into as many different corporations with as many different names as they choose and holding land separately as different corporations?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is.

Mr. BACON. There is none, I think.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand there is an express provision prohibiting that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is.

Mr. BACON. I will come to that.

Mr. FORAKER. There is a provision that no corporation shall be interested in more than one tract.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senators will take me one at a time.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure. I hope I may be allowed to discharge my duty to the Senator from Wisconsin first, and my obligation, which I am most delighted to recognize, before undertaking to reply to anybody else.

Mr. QUARLES. I simply want to call attention to section 31, which, it seems to me, will require the Senator to modify the proposition he made a few moments ago regarding mining corporations.

Mr. BACON. So far as mining corporations are concerned, I only used that for an illustration; but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is mistaken, as is the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], in the implied approval of that, and also in supposing that those are the only classes of corporations in which parties could hold land. Does the Senator forget the building and loan associations which hold real estate ad libitum? I do not know whether there are any building or loan associations in the Philippine Islands, but there might be such associations there for the purpose of buying and selling lands. Would not that be within the purview?

Mr. FORAKER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is expressly prohibited by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LODGE. It is expressly prohibited by section 77.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly it is.

Mr. BACON. Building and loan associations are not prohibited in that section; but that is simply an illustration. But, Mr. President, I mean to say that, except where expressly limited, there is no limitation upon the amount of land which may be owned; and those express limitations, instead of being comprehensive, are specific. Why is it that the committee do not say that no corporation shall hold exceeding 5,000 acres? That is simple. That would leave no doubt. What motive can there be in omitting to say so plainly, in so many words, if the purpose is that no corporation shall hold exceeding 5,000 acres of land?

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator that where it is unlimited it is unlimited, and where it is limited it is limited. I agree with the Senator that far.

Mr. BACON. I have often heretofore been greatly illuminated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and on this particular occasion most especially so.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he yielded. I had no desire to interrupt him or to protract his speech.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator from Massachusetts made his speech he was very particular to ask Senators not to interrupt him, and I, on the contrary, invite Senators to interrupt me as much as they wish.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As the Senator asked a question and looked at me, I wondered whether he wanted an answer from me.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection, of course, though I think it might be well for me to proceed with some degree of continuity; but if it pleases the Senator to interrupt me, I will yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BACON. It is no interruption in the least. The Senator knows I will yield to him as quickly as to anyone else.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator asked the question, "Why was it that it was not provided that no corporation should hold more than 5,000 acres of land?" The reason, I think, is clear from the section itself, that in the case of manufacturing or other than agricultural corporations they can not hold more land than is necessary for their factories and works; whereas if we merely said that no corporation, agricultural or otherwise, could own more than 5,000 acres of land, we could permit a manufacturing corporation or any other corporation to own 5,000 acres of land, which would be against public policy. Is that satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. BACON. If there were a simple line in this section to the effect that no corporation should hold exceeding 5,000 acres of land, it would be an end of the whole matter; but when the bill, while it goes forward and makes specifications, fails to make such a prohibition, the question is, Why does it fail to do so?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia whether, if such a provision was inserted in this bill, limiting the holdings of any corporation of any kind to 5,000 acres of land, it would not be true that a manufacturing corporation under that might own 5,000 acres of land?

Mr. BACON. Not at all. There is an express prohibition against manufacturing corporations holding anything except what they actually need for the purposes of their business. If they actually need it, under the bill as it now stands they are authorized to hold it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator suggested that there should be a provision here that corporation holdings should be limited to 5,000 acres.

Mr. BACON. No; I beg your pardon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the limitation was to be effective, perhaps, he said. Then, I will ask the Senator, as a lawyer, according to the very well-known maxim, which he will readily recall, whether, if that limitation was put in the bill, a manufacturing corporation might not own 5,000 acres of land if it wanted to?

Mr. BACON. I understand that under the bill, as it now stands, if a manufacturing corporation needs land in its business it is authorized to hold it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understand, under the bill as it now stands, if a corporation needs more than that amount, it is authorized to hold it. There is no doubt about that. I understand that, with the exception of agricultural corporations, any corporation which needs in the proper and fixed performance of the functions of its corporate powers more than 5,000 acres, it is authorized to hold them. That is true, I think.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the limitation that the Senator suggests were put in here, then a manufacturing corporation might own exceeding 5,000 acres of land, although it did not need it in its business. That is the point.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am delighted to see the interest which Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber are developing in this bill. They have heretofore been strangely indifferent to it. They have not only had nothing to say themselves, except when some one of them had a set speech to make, but they have, following the lead of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], considered that there was nothing that could be said on this side which could possibly change any opinion, and they have not listened to what has been said upon this side. I am delighted, although it has subjected me to some little disarrangement of my argument, to have them suddenly awaken to the fact that there are questions as to which we on this side of the Chamber are entitled to have discussion and explanation from the other side of the Chamber.

I return now, however, to the original proposition which I made, and that is, whereas it was within the power of the framers of this bill to have put the limitation of 5,000 acres upon all corporations, which would have relieved any question as to whether any corporation had any right to hold over 5,000 acres, they have studiously refrained from putting that general limitation upon it, and have endeavored to show by construction that it is not probable that a corporation will have more than 5,000 acres.

I do not wish to be understood as recognizing the propriety of the 5,000-acre limit, or the explanation of it on that point; that is entirely too much; but I think that the most objectionable part of this proposed legislation is that it affords an opportunity for the exploitation of those islands before the people themselves have the opportunity to say what they wish done with them; that the majority here are taking advantage of a time when the people have no voice in the disposition of their properties or in the determination of matters which are to influence and control their future; that in hot haste those now in control of legislation are sacrificing—I will not use that word—subordinating everything to the passage of this bill, the only feature of which, in which, or by which the law will be changed from its present condition in any material point is that it gives an opportunity for the exploitation of the islands.

That is not all, Mr. President. It is giving a power to this Commission of an unlimited character with reference to the disposition of lands and with reference to the disposition of franchises which ought not to be committed to anybody, and which ought not even to be exercised by Congress, in my opinion, at this time, before the status of those islands is definitely decided and before the people have been admitted to a participation in their government. It is not simply an unlimited power which is given, but there is a most remarkable provision in this bill with reference to the rules and regulations which are to be made by this Commission in the disposition of this immense public domain.

It may be that there are some precedents for the peculiar feature of the bill to which I now wish to call attention and which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts did not think worthy, in his exhaustive explanation, of any comment whatever. That is this: The power of Congress over the public domain is generally considered to be primary. It is generally considered to be the highest power. This I simply call attention to in passing. These—

> Regulations shall not go into effect or have the force of law until they have received the approval of the President, by and through the Secretary of War—

Why that is put in there it is beyond my imagination to conceive—"By and through the Secretary of War"— > and they shall also be submitted to Congress—

The point to which I wish to call attention is the succeeding part of the paragraph—

> and unless disapproved or amended by Congress at the next ensuing session after their submission they shall at the close of such session have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands, when they shall have received the approval of the President, as hereinbefore provided.

In other words, it emancipates the Philippine government from the control of Congress in this most important function of the disposition of this immense territorial domain, for unless there is affirmative action by Congress within the first session these regulations become law. In other words, if by some chance—some of the Senators who do me the honor to give me their attention doubtless think it is a small chance, but still it is a possibility—the House of Representatives should pass under the control of the present minority party, the Senate of course remaining under the control of the dominant party, although the House of Representatives should disapprove of the regulations thus made, the Philippine Commission would be supreme, and the regulations they made for the disposition of the public lands would be law without the approval of Congress and in spite of the disapproval of the House of Representatives. In other words, instead of having the approval of Congress, they are simply subject to the negative of Congress, and that negative must be applied during the first session of Congress thereafter. Now, if there is a precedent for that——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I will yield with pleasure, although I should very much like to have the pleasure of hearing the Senator from Indiana in one of his entertaining speeches after I get through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is very kind. He made a remark a moment ago about Senators on this side, from which I now trust he will exclude me. I have listened with patience and interest to the speeches on the other side.

Mr. BACON. I most cheerfully accord that to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And further, I have not made any set speech, but have confined myself to the debates which have occurred on the spur of the moment.

Mr. BACON. That is absolutely true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to know if the Senator by his last remark means that Congress could not, after the passage of this bill, pass any act with reference to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am afraid the Senator did not weigh his last remark.

Mr. BACON. I do weigh it. I say that upon so grave a matter as the disposition of all the public lands in the Philippine Islands, there ought to be the approval of Congress of whatever is done by the commissioners, and I say this bill does not provide for the approval of Congress, but, on the contrary, makes what is done by the commissioners final unless at the first session of Congress there shall be a disapproval by Congress. Now, I have weighed those words, and I think they are correct words when weighed. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Indiana heard me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say that my attention was temporarily diverted by a remark made to me by our mutual good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will be very glad indeed to hear the Senator repeat his remark, because he never does it.

Mr. BACON. I will, for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana. It may not be necessary to repeat it in the RECORD.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. BACON. I said that in the disposition of this immense public domain there ought to be either the direct action of Congress, which should prescribe the manner in which it should be done, or there ought to be the approval by Congress of the acts of those to whom this duty is delegated; that this provision of the pending bill does not require either. It takes the matter away from Congress, it delegates it to the Commission, and does not make it subject, so far as a requirement would go, to the approval of the Congress; but it provides that when they have made a rule, if it shall be approved by the President, in the absence of the approval or disapproval by Congress, the immense public domain shall be disposed of according to the individual judgment of the several commissioners.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You mean their collective judgment?

Mr. BACON. Individual and collective.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That is the criticism which I make, and if there is a precedent for that in the administration of the disposition of the public domain, I am not informed of it. I may be in error in that regard, but I am not in doubt as to one proposition, and that is if there is a precedent for it it is open to the same criticism I make upon this, and that it is not a proper thing to do.

Mr. President, there are a great many things in the bill which I could spend time in discussing. I will allude to two or three only, because I want to talk about some other matters, and I would have been at it a half hour ago if the suggestion I made had not attracted the antagonism of Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

I said there were one or two qualifications to the general statement which I had made that this bill conferred no governmental powers which were not already found in existence under the civil government organized under the war power and under the civil government authorized by the Spooner bill, except as to these matters of the public lands, timber, minerals, and franchises. Now, there are these several changes in the proposed law. It makes the commissioners, hereafter appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate; but the important fact, so far as I am able to ascertain, is that there is no limitation to the terms of the present commissioners and that this measure confirms them in their office without limitation. It appoints them for life. If I am incorrect in that respect, I shall be very glad to be corrected.

It also provides that the highest court shall be composed of judges who shall be confirmed by the Senate. In the hasty examination which I have been able to give, I may also be in error in that regard, but as I read it, there is no limitation upon the terms of those judges, and therefore this proposed act tends to the confirmation for all time of those judges now in office. But those are minor matters. As I have said, those are things which are not urgent.

The urgent feature of the bill is that which confers upon the civil government the power to dispose of the properties of which I speak, in the disposition of which there is the opportunity for the exploitation of the islands. I will call attention in this connection to the Spooner bill.

The Spooner bill as originally introduced in Congress was one which had no limitation upon the power of exploitation, and that bill was not only introduced in Congress but it was pressed under whip and spur. Everything was subordinated to it. We were threatened with extra sessions and everything else if it were not passed, and when it was passed, and the provision was put upon it which limited the power of exploitation, it was immediately dropped as a useless piece of furniture, and there has never been any action taken under it.

There has never been any government organized under it. When this provision was put upon it, offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], all interest in the bill ceased. As originally introduced it gave to the President the most unlimited power to organize any government which, in his opinion, might seem to be fit and proper. There was no limitation upon his powers. Life, liberty, property, franchises—everything which could be imagined within the range of governmental power—was confided in the President. It was a most important and valuable bill as long as it stood in that shape, but this provision was put upon it.

> That no sale or lease or other disposition of the public lands or the timber thereon or the mining rights therein shall be made: And provided further, That no franchise shall be granted which is not approved by the President of the United States, and is not in his judgment clearly necessary for the immediate government of the islands and indispensable for the interest of the people thereof, and which can not, without great public mischief, be postponed until the establishment of permanent civil government; and all such franchises shall terminate one year after the establishment of such permanent civil government.

When that amendment was put upon the bill it ceased to be of value, and it has rested in the archives of this Government from that day to this as a piece of worthless paper.

I remember, sir, that when the Spooner bill was pending in the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress we had from those in civil office in Manila cablegrams to the effect that it was extremely important that the Spooner bill should be passed as quickly as possible. It rested during that session of Congress, and it was not passed. It was taken up in the short and last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress and put through, as I said, under whip and spur, and when in the last moment this amendment was put upon it all interest in it ceased, and there has never been anything done under it since that time.

Mr. President, I will not say that Senators have a purpose in this matter, because that would be offensive to them, and I will not say it outside of the fact that it would be offensive to them, but I do say that the effect of this proposed legislation is what I have described. The effect of this proposed legislation found in the pending bill, and its only material effect, is to put in the power of those who wish to exploit these islands the opportunity for this exploitation, which does not exist under the present law.

Now, sir, there are a great many reasons why this should not be done. I have suggested that it is not a proper thing to do while this embryonic condition lasts, while these people are not in a position to say what they want done with their own country, and the property and franchises of their own country; and I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that so high an authority as General MacArthur himself says that a provision which promotes the opportunity for the exploitation of the islands will defeat the very purpose which they say they have in view in the passage of this bill, and that is to promote the pacification of the islands.

I read from page 887 of the hearings before the Philippine Committee, it being a part of General MacArthur's testimony. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] is asking him a question:

> I mean people selected by the Filipinos themselves and an assembly sharing the government—those men selected by the Filipinos themselves—when it comes to the matter of granting franchises for railroads and things of that sort and for distributing the public lands.
> General MACARTHUR. I should like to see that thing deferred as long as possible, except in one instance, and that is in regard to railroads. All other franchises I should like to see held in abeyance until the evolution has progressed a little further. Railroads are essential for everybody's interests.

The part which I read now comes before that. It is on the preceding page, 876:

> Senator CARMACK. General, in one of your reports—I have forgotten which one now, whether it was your first or your later report—you speak of the bad effect upon the people—its effect as being a great obstacle to the pacification of the islands—of the effort toward too rapid exploitation of the country. I would be glad for you to tell the committee a little more about that—what you meant by that statement.
> General MACARTHUR. I stated pretty clearly in my report that one of the great apprehensions of the people there is that the effect of exploitation will be to deprive them of their resources and relegate them eventually to a position of social inferiority, about which they are very sensitive.

Then comes the part which I have just read, in which he says that he thinks that exploitation of the islands will tend to prevent their proper pacification.

I repeat, I do not intend to charge any purpose upon Senators; I acquit them of purpose; but I want to say to them that the hungry vultures which expect to strike their talons into this prey have been wheeling and circling about this Capitol, and during this debate have perched in the galleries of this Chamber.

Mr. President, I had no idea of occupying so much time upon these features of the bill. I was led to do so—and I have not more than touched some of its important features—by the fact that the statement had been made to the Senate that there had been an exhaustive explanation of the bill, whereas I do not think any has been made at all, except to call attention to the provisions of the bill, which anybody would find out who had the opportunity and the inclination to read it.

But there is no doubt about it that as to the general features of the bill, outside of the matter of exploitation, everything which was said with reference to the Spooner bill, which gave unlimited power to a few men over these islands and of the people of the islands, is true as to this, and what is still more important, the limitations upon that bill preventing exploitation are removed, and now there is practically no limitation whatever. When this bill is passed the matter practically passes from the domain of Congress.

Sir, it is a strange fact that so important a matter as the organization of a government for the Philippine Islands should attract so little attention from the Congress of the United States. It is a strange matter that Senators are willing to take a bill and pass it upon the simple recognition of the fact that it is presented by their party, and as I have every reason to believe, a great many of them have never even read the bill. I say I have reason to believe it, because numbers have stated to me that they have never even read the bill. They are willing to take the judgment of the committee.

The question, What kind of a bill should be passed, is one which should be very largely influenced by the question to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] alluded in his opening remarks in his recent speech on this subject, and that is whether or not it is the purpose of the United States to retain permanent dominion over these islands; whether it is the purpose to maintain them in a position of colonial dependency, or whether it is the purpose to invest them with free government.

There has been in this regard a great deal of criticism about the debate on the pending bill. Senators have said that the discussion which has been had on that subject really had nothing to do with the question as to the kind of government we ought to provide for the people of those islands, whereas the truth is that it is the great central question about which all other questions with reference to the organization of a government for the islands must necessarily revolve. If it is our purpose permanently to retain these islands, one kind of a government should be framed for them. On the other hand, if it is our purpose not permanently to retain them, if it is the purpose to do what so many Senators said three and four years ago was the intention of this Government, to erect a free government there, then another kind of a government should be framed by us for them at this time.

There is no doubt about the fact that if we are to retain permanent dominion of the Philippine Islands there is but one kind of government which we can have for them. If we are to permanently retain the Philippine Islands it is an impossibility that they can ever occupy any other relation to the people of the United States than the relation of colonies, and their people can only be subjects. It is an impossibility that they can ever have the relation of equals with us in this Government. It is an impossibility that they should ever participate with us in the control of this Government. It is an impossibility that they can ever become States. That would involve, with the population they have, 40 or 50 or 60 Filipino Representatives in the other branch of Congress, according to the apportionment which might be made, and at least two, if not more, Senators in this Chamber, and would involve 50 or 60 electoral votes. The people of the United States would never consent to that. It is an impossibility.

And, sir, his is no new suggestion. It was the foundation upon which was rested the great opposition which was made to the acquisition of these islands, and that was that it presented to the people of the United States the alternative propositions, if we were to acquire and hold these islands, first, whether they would ever consent that they should be incorporated in our body politic as parts of our self-governing community; and second, whether if that were not done the United States would go into the business of colonial government of people who were not and could not be citizens, but who in the nature of things could only be subjects.

Mr. President, I repeat that the proposition made in the beginning is a vital proposition to-day, and if Senators can see any middle ground, I should be glad for them to point it out. The American people are not divided upon the question whether the Filipinos are to be admitted either now or hereafter into equal participation with us in the control of our governmental affairs. They do not propose that the Philippines shall ever be admitted as one or several States of this Union. The real division among us is not as to that determination by the American people.

The real division is as to what shall be done in view of that determination. You say that the islands should not become a part of the United States and that their people should not be citizens of the United States, and that therefore the islands should be held as colonies and their people as subjects. We say also that the islands should not become part of the United States and that their people should not be admitted to participation with us in the control of our Government, and that being so, we say we should not hold the islands as colonies but should have no political connection with them. In other words, that we should in an orderly and proper way, having due regard to all of our obligations, give the Filipinos a government of their own.

Unless snap judgment is taken upon the people, unless it is done by some act of Congress some time when the people do not know it and have not the power to arrest it, the time will never come when the people of the United States will consent that the Philippine Islands shall become incorporated as a part of our body politic equal with us in the administration and control of this Government.

That being the case, we are remitted to the proposition that if they are not to be so admitted they must be controlled as colonists and as subjects. Mr. President, the term "subjects" is not a pleasant term in our ears. I have never yet seen any Senator who, in discussing our Philippine policy, meets and answers squarely the question whether a man residing in a subject territory who is denied the rights of citizenship in the sovereign country, denied the privilege of taking part in the Government, can be anything else than a subject.

I know that some of the learned Senators who are to follow me—if not immediately, before the close of this debate—can solve that question, if anybody can, and I would be delighted to hear from them a discussion of that proposition and to have them say whether or not it is correct, and whether any man who is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, living in a part of the territory, if you please, of the United States not incorporated as a part of the United States, who is denied the rights of citizenship, can be anything else but a subject, and if so, what is the relation which he occupies?

If it be true that it is our purpose to hold this people in colonial dependence under circumstances which make it impossible that they can ever be admitted with us in equal participation in the control of this Government, then it is an important fact to be ascertained and to be considered in determining the question what kind of a government we shall give them. If that is our purpose, then our attention should be directed to the framing of a government which shall have that end in view. If we are going to be permanently committed to a colonial career, if we are going to be permanently committed to the proposition of holding people as subjects who shall never be citizens, then let us in an intelligent way address ourselves to the proposition as to what kind of government it shall be which we shall give them, having that purpose in view.

But if, on the other hand, we have the high and the noble purpose which was entertained and expressed by leading members of the Senate at the time of the acquisition of these islands to establish them in their own nationality and to give them free government, then now is the time for us to act upon that purpose, and we should in acting upon that purpose do one of two things. If the time has not come when we can safely start in that direction, then we should have now no legislation.

I recollect when the Senator from Wisconsin in a speech in the Senate said that we would not be in a position to legislate for these islands until a committee of Congress had gone to the islands and had correctly informed themselves and were prepared to inform Congress of the conditions there. I thought the statement of the Senator was eminently wise, and with a much better knowledge of conditions now I am convinced that there should be this investigation and report by a Congressional committee before we attempt to legislate for the islands. But I submit as sound another proposition.

Unless we have made up our minds that we intend to hold these islands as permanent colonial dependencies of the Government, one of two things ought to be done. We either ought to let things stay as they are—in the control of the civil government, of which we have heard so many very flattering accounts—or we ought to begin with the formation of a government, out of which there shall be ultimately evolved the free government which we design for this people.

So I submit, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], while he was not, as I thought, altogether correct in his conclusions as to the particular influence which the decision of that question would have upon us, was entirely correct in the statement that the question as to what was our intention in reference to the ultimate disposition of these islands is a most important question for us to consider in determining what shall be the frame of government which we shall make for those islands.

Now, sir, there is another consideration, one I confess that I do not approach with any degree of pleasure, but still one that I think we can not in any recognition of duty turn away from. The character of the war which is waged there is one necessarily to be considered in determining the question whether we shall retain those islands as colonial dependencies of the United States Government.

I will state my reason for that statement. Some of us would be opposed to a colonial government under any circumstances, because we think it is inconsistent with the genius of our institutions; because we think that any advantages which may result from the colonial system will be far outweighed by the evils which must attend such a system; because we believe that a colonial system is not only inconsistent with our form of government, but that it endangers our free institutions in the fact that those things which are necessary to maintain colonial government are antagonistic to the fundamental free principles upon which our Government was formed, and upon which it has heretofore rested. So under any circumstances there are those of us who would oppose the formation of any colonial government or the holding of colonies as dependencies.

But there are others, Mr. President, who might favor colonial government if it were not attended by any horrors or atrocities or cruelties, who would be opposed to it if colonial dominion can only be secured and maintained by such atrocities and such cruelties as we can not possibly approve.

Therefore, sir, it is most important when we come to the question as to whether or not we will maintain colonial government in the Philippines to consider what has been the means necessary in order to set up the authority of the United States there—to crush out opposition to that authority—and what will be the means necessary in order to maintain hereafter the authority of the United States.

The experience which we have had there in that regard teaches a lesson which can not be misunderstood. That lesson is that the subjection of inferior races is always accomplished only through the much shedding of blood, and that after it has been accomplished such dominion is only maintained through the continued repetitions of the shedding of blood. It is a dominion which is only maintained through the drawn sword. There is nothing new in this. The lesson now presented to us has long since been learned by other nations.

I do not desire, sir, to say anything to the disparagement of the English people, and what I now say has no such purpose. With her colonies England has girdled the globe, and the shedding of their blood is with her a daily work. Most of these are of inferior races, and it is doubtless true that not in many decades has the sun arisen on its mission of life but before it has set it has witnessed the shedding by England of the blood of the people of foreign lands which it thus dominates; and within a time not long ago there was one day when the blood of over 13,000 of those people was shed in order to maintain this policy of the British Government.

It so happened that last year I was at Aden, in Arabia, a British fortress. The first news that we had on landing was that an expedition of British troops had been sent to attack some Arabs in an adjoining province who had defied the British authority, and while we were there the expedition returned, bringing its wounded swinging on the backs of camels, their dead left out on the sand, their blood mingled with that of the Arabs whom they had slain in their expedition.

As I said, I do not say this, Mr. President, in disparagement of the British people. They are among the most civilized and Christian people of the whole earth. But it is an absolute essential of the success of the colonial policy of their Government. There may be some excuse for them, because they are upon a little island and they have to go out to the world. Shut up in their own island, they would famish. But there is no excuse for us.

We have had in the past four years an unfortunate amount of the same experience, and if we are to continue in it; if we are to continue in the policy of colonialism; if we are to endeavor to hold inferior races against their will, it will be necessary for the American people to hold up their hands every day and repeat the prayer of David to be delivered from blood-guiltiness.

Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss at length the subject which we have heard discussed so much of late in this Chamber as to the cruelties and atrocities which have been perpetrated in the Philippine Islands by our troops, and I only allude to it for the purpose of drawing a lesson. I only allude to it for the purpose of drawing the lesson which I have already stated—that it is an invariable, if you please, a necessary, feature of colonial government, of the domination of inferior races by the superior race, of holding them in subjection against their will, that there shall be continued bloodshed and the opportunity and the exercise of the most shocking cruelties and barbarities.

We have all been shocked at these atrocities and cruelties. I thought at one time I would be able to say that there was no one who would justify and defend them, but I am compelled to say that in this Chamber some have come perilously near it. I want to ask Senators what is the difference between Senators on that side of the Chamber and this? No, I will not put it that way, Mr. President, because it ought not to be that side of the Chamber and this side. What is the difference between Senators who approve of the Philippine policy as it is now exercised and those who disapprove of it on the question of these atrocities?

Of course we know there are vast differences between us as to other matters, but I want to put my finger on the point. What is the difference between Senators who are in favor of the colonial policy and the domination of this people against their will and Senators who are opposed to that policy and who are opposed to the domination of the people against their will? What is the difference between those two classes of Senators on the question of these atrocities?

Do Senators approve of the atrocities there? I can answer for them that they do not. There is not a Senator who will rise in his place and say here that he approves of them. If Senators do not approve of them, by what right do they condemn those who utter their disapproval of them? Would Senators, if these atrocities have been committed, prefer that they should not be disclosed? Would Senators, if those atrocities have been committed, prefer that there should be still opportunity and license for their continuance through their being undiscovered and unknown, or would Senators prefer, the atrocities being perpetrated, that they should be known? And being perpetrated and being known, would Senators prefer that they should be condemned, or would they prefer that they be justified and approved?

Is there an issue of fact between Senators on the other side of this question and ourselves? If there is, there is room for argument. If we charge the atrocities and they deny them, then there is room for question. But when there is no dispute as to the atrocities, when there is no question of fact, the only question is, What shall be our utterance in view of the admitted facts?

Shall we justify and applaud them? If we are to justify these acts, then we are to say that torture, cruel, physical torture, even unto the verge of death, in order to extort information, is justifiable. If we are to justify them, then we are to say that in order to compel the coming in and the surrender of the insurrectos in the mountains, who can not otherwise be reached, it is right to kill and destroy the noncombatant population, to burn all their cities and towns, to destroy all their food supplies, and to make the land a howling wilderness. If Senators do not justify these acts, what is the explanation of their vehement assault upon Senators who condemn them? If they justify them, let them say so plainly and defend them as right and proper. If torture terrible and many times inflicted be not right, and if Senators are not ready to say so in plain, unmistakable language, then the attention of the Senate is not to be diverted and the ears of the American people are not to be stopped by the uproar and din of declamation concerning the honor and glory of the Army.

Now, do Senators differ with us, in view of the fact of these admitted atrocities, as to whether or not they should be approved or condemned? If they are approved, what is the effect? If they are approved, then it is not the act of a part of the Army, but it is assumed as the act of the whole Army and defended as a proper act. Are Senators ready to take that position? If, Mr. President, they are approved, is there any difference between the guilty and the innocent? If they are approved, is there any vindication of the innocent? Can there be any vindication of the innocent except in the condemnation of the guilty?

Sir, who is the friend of the Army? I ask these Senators who assume to be the defenders of the Army the question, Who is the defender of the Army, the man who denounces these atrocities and says they are unworthy of the Army, and the man who denies that they are acts of the Army, and who says that they are the acts of an unworthy part of the Army? Is he the friend of the Army, or is the Senator the friend of the Army who defends the acts and makes no distinction between the guilty and the innocent?

What right have Senators to stand here and assume that they represent the Army? Those of us who represent the policy against colonialism belong to no section. We represent no section. We are here from North and from South, from East and from West. I am glad to say that we are not even confined to one party, and I wish to God it were so that there were nothing to indicate party lines, because it is a question more important than party.

By what right do Senators assume that they represent the Army? Have they any greater interests in the Army than we? Their sons, their brothers are in the Army; so are ours. The sons of their neighbors, and their neighbors themselves, are in the Army; so are ours, and the honor of that Army and of those sons, and brothers, and neighbors is as dear to us as it is to them. The honor of that Army can not be held dearer by them than it is by us, and the honor of the flag it bears can not be dearer to them than it is to us.

They will not rush to its defense more promptly or more eagerly than will we. Their sacrifices in its defense will not be more freely made than will our own. To maintain, to keep it high advanced on every field, those of us representing, I repeat, not one section, but all sections, who are opposed to this policy and who denounce the atrocities which have grown out of it, are as ready as they when that flag is in trouble or in peril to pour out our blood and our treasure, not only in equal amount or proportion with theirs, but without stint and without measurement. Senators on the other side of this question can say no more for themselves or for their people. Who dares take issue with the truth of this statement?

Mr. President, Senators who stand here and denounce these acts and denounce the perpetrators of them, and who claim that they are the acts of an unlicensed minority who have simply had the opportunity given them by this pernicious policy, and that they are not the acts of the great body of the American Army, are the friends and the champions of the Army, and not those who simply shelter themselves behind a general defense of the acts and draw no distinction between the innocent and the guilty.

Now, sir, I know a great many of those soldiers; I know a great many of those officers. I am not hazarding anything in saying that there are just as many from my State in proportion to the population as from any other State of the Union, and the honor of those men and those officers, some of whom have in their veins my own blood, is as dear to me and to others who stand like I do as it is to those who are opposed to us.

We denounce these acts, Mr. President, not against the Army, but in the name of the Army, and we denounce them in order that the innocent men who are above any such thing should not be confounded with the guilty. We denounce these acts in the name of the Army in order that those whose authorization of and acquiescence in their perpetration, be they high or low, may be arraigned before the great bar of public justice and adjudged in the high court of the American conscience.

Are these atrocities right? If they are, no defense is needed; all that is necessary is to say that they are right. If they are right, there is no need why anybody should be court-martialed or why a cablegram should go across the waters directing that they should be court-martialed. If they are right, then simply say so, and defend them and assume them as the acts of the Army. If they are wrong, condemn them, and condemn those who perpetrated them and let the innocent be vindicated.

Now, it will be said, if that is so, what application has the perpetration of these fiendish tortures to this question? What application has it to this question if they are simply the acts of an unbridled and unlicensed minority? Well, I say that is exactly what I conceive them to be, and the application which I make of it is that we, a free, liberty-loving people, we, the great exponents of republican institutions and free institutions, by sending an army across the ocean to another hemisphere to subjugate and dominate a weak people of an inferior race, have given the opportunity for these acts of atrocity and outrage. And further, Mr. President, the great fact for the consideration of the American people and to be in the present moment applied by them is that the continuance of this policy of colonial subjection and domination gives license and opportunity in the future for the practice of these atrocities.

Mr. President, I submit to Senators that they have not been entirely candid with the Senate and with the country in the discussion of this question. Senators have discussed the question whether or not torture was a legitimate retaliation, when torture and outrage had been inflicted by others, against whom this torture is now directed. The greater part of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was taken up with a recitation of the outrages which had been committed by the Filipinos. Well, who defends them? Who does otherwise than execrate them and condemn these atrocities?

It is possible that there may be such an outrage perpetrated that the party suffering the outrage, or his friends, may be driven by madness to retaliate. He may be even driven to torture, for which, while there can be no excuse, there may be palliation under such circumstances. But unfortunately for Senators that was not the question. That was not the question, and Senators evaded the true question in the case. The evidence which is upon our tables, taken by the Philippine Committee—and I am going to speak about no facts outside of what have been brought here by testimony—was not as to torture inflicted in retaliation, but as to torture inflicted for the purpose of extorting information and extorting confession.

Now, I ask Senators—they have ample time for reply—is there any justification or palliation for torture inflicted for the purpose not of retaliation, but of extorting information or extorting confession?

That is the question. That is the evidence which is piled up here. Evidence is piled up here that the torture has been inflicted not for retaliation, not in the heat of blood to avenge an outrage, but for the purpose of extorting information and for the purpose of extorting confession. If that is right, Mr. President, let us have the manhood to say so. If it is wrong, let us have the equal manhood to say so, and let us in the pursuit of this matter take such steps as will find out and condemn the guilty and thus vindicate the innocent. If it is right, then we have gone back to the days of the thumbscrew and the rack. If it is wrong, the ears of the American people are not to be stopped by an uproar as to the honor of the Army.

Senators admit the atrocities, but set up the honor of the Army. The attitude of Senators on the other side would seem to be this: The American Army has achieved great glory and honor in the past. It has achieved great glory and honor in the Philippines. It is true that cruel physical torture to extort information is wrong. It is true that it has been largely practiced by some of the army in the Philippines. It is wrong to burn and to devastate a whole country; it is wrong to kill and burn indiscriminately and to convert the land into a howling wilderness. It is true all this is wrong and that all this has been done in the Philippines; but nothing must be said about it; there must be no word of condemnation, because the Army has achieved honor and glory. When, in answer to the charge of atrocities, the cry of the honor of the Army is raised, this is what it means and nothing more.

I repeat, we stand for the real honor of the Army—for the honor of the part of it that has been guilty of no dishonor—and in endeavoring to saddle this upon the guilty and to vindicate the innocent we are doing more for the honor of the Army than Senators who simply propose to make no distinction between the innocent and the guilty and ascribe everything that is said on this subject to an attack upon the Army.

Mr. President, regardless of what we may think about the Philippine question, regardless as to whether we approve of the war in the Philippines or not, we all of us accord full meed of praise to the soldiers who are there doing their duty. It is not for them to ask questions as to the cause in which they fight. It is for them simply to obey orders. The American Army has achieved honor not only elsewhere, but in the Philippine Islands. I stand here, Mr. President, not claiming any special right to defend the Army more than others, but I do stand here to avow my championship of men whom I know in that Army whom I believe incapable of the atrocities which have been charged against some of them.

Sir, there is a very much more serious question to my mind in this Philippine question than the water torture. When we are arraigned before the bar of public opinion—as we necessarily must be on the question of our responsibility for this torture, this going back three hundred and odd years to torture for the purpose of extorting information and extorting confessions—when we are arraigned for that, I say, before the bar of public opinion the world over, our reply is going to be, and properly, that this was not an act authorized by those high in command; that it was done either by individuals or by small detachments under the charge of subordinate officers, and that we repudiate it and condemn it.

That is going to be the reply. There is nothing else to save our own conscience. But the rejoinder will be that we ought not to have put ourselves in a position where this shame and dishonor could be brought upon us—because it is a shame and a dishonor—even though done without our authority. It is a shame and a dishonor that it is done, but it is a tenfold greater shame and dishonor if done and not condemned by us. In any event the stain is deep, but it is indelible if we do not disclaim it and condemn it. But, as I say, that is our reply. We need not think we are going to escape the judgment of history. We have got to meet this charge at the bar of history just as Spain has had to meet at the bar of history the charge of the atrocities committed by the Duke of Alva. That is to be our reply. Whether it is a good defense or not, it is the defense we will make.

I join in making it, and I join in making it with more confidence because I condemn these acts and I condemn their perpetrators, and because I seek to vindicate those who are innocent of any participation in these crimes. I make the defense with the more confidence because I disclaim it for the Army, and I make it with a consciousness of fault in the fact that we have given the opportunity for these crimes—an opportunity always embraced in every similar condition the world around whenever people put themselves in a position of turning out to take possession of people against their will and of dominating inferior races and controlling them by the sword.

But, Mr. President, I say there is another feature of this case that is a very much more serious one, to my mind, than the torture feature, and the answer that we thus make, and will make, at the bar of public conscience, the answer which we will record in the annals of history—for arraigned we will be, and plead as we must—is that which I have indicated. But there is another feature in which I am afraid we can not make that plea or sustain it if we do make it.

I think that the question of our responsibility for the reconcentrado camps and all that goes with the reconcentrado camps is a very much more serious question than the question of water torture or any other torture inflicted by individuals or small detachments, because there is no possible escape from the fact that the reconcentrado policy has had the direct acquiescence and approval of those in authority, and whatever goes with that necessarily devolves as a responsibility upon those who have thus authorized it and justified it. The burning of houses, the devastation of a country, the destruction of all food crops in a country, the driving of the people out of wide areas into restricted bounds, can not be done by individuals, it can not be done by small detachments, but it must be done under general authority.

Not only so, but we have here the orders of the generals in the field authorizing and directing the creation of reconcentrado camps and prescribing the details under which they shall be organized and maintained. We are apt to think about the reconcentrado camps simply in connection with sufferings which may be endured by those within the camps and, in the case of the Cuban reconcentrado camps, where there was not food, then, of course, all the added horrors of that tropical climate constituted one of the features of the reconcentrado camps; but the greatest horror and the greatest suffering which are occasioned by the reconcentrado camps is not the horror and the suffering within the camp but the horror and the suffering without the camp.

When a general prescribes a certain limited area, within which he says all the people must congregate, there must be the corresponding direction which will enforce that order, and the corresponding direction is that everything outside of those prescribed limits shall be without protection, and both as to property and life be subject to destruction. Only in that way can people be carried within the limits of the reconcentrado camps.

It is because life is unsafe out of them; because life is almost certain to be sacrificed out of them; because all property left outside is to be destroyed; because all houses are to be burned; because the country is to be made a desert waste; because within a camp is a zone of life and without the camp a widespread area of death and desolation. That is what a reconcentrado camp means. Do you suppose, if there is an invitation to people to come within a reconcentrado camp, that they are going to come there unless they are forced there? Is there any way to force them except to say that it is death to remain outside?

Why, Mr. President, when the limited area of a reconcentrado camp is prescribed, the people can not be collected and driven in there. The soldiers can not go out and find them and drive them in as you would a drove of horses. It is only by putting upon them this order, this pressure of life and death that they are made to flee within the limits of the reconcentrado camps to escape the torch and the sword that destroys all without. When a general prescribes a reconcentrado camp—and I am going, before I get through, to read Bell's order to show that that is what it means—when a general prescribes a reconcentrado camp, he practically says that everybody outside must come inside or die; he practically says to his soldiers, those who do not get inside shall be slaughtered; and the practical operation is that those who do not get inside are slaughtered.

Mr. President, I want to read to you a description of a reconcentrado camp. I will say that this letter is written by an officer whom I know personally, and for whom I vouch in my place in the Senate as a high-toned man and a courageous and chivalric officer, one who does his duty regardless of whether he approves of the cause in which he is told to fight or not, and one in every way worthy of confidence and esteem. This was a letter written by him with no injunction of secrecy in it, because he had no idea or thought that it would ever be made public. I make it public now simply for the information of the Senate, in order that they may have some idea of what a reconcentrado camp is.

I omit the name of the place from which the letter was written for the same reason that I omit the name of the officer. I will not say any more of him than that he is a graduate of West Point and a professional soldier. I will state further that there is some allusion in the letter to vampires. A vampire in those islands is a bird about the size of a crow, which wheels and circles above the head at night and which is plainly visible at night. As I have said, I know the officer personally and vouch for him in every way. Senators will see from the reading of this letter that it is simply the casual and ordinary narration of a friend writing to a friend. He says:

On our way over here we stopped at —— in peaceful —— to leave our surplus stuff so as to get into—light shape, and as we landed at midnight there they weren't satisfied with bolos and shotguns, but little brown brother actually upon us with brass cannon in that officially quiet burg under efficient civil government. What a farce it all is.

That is his comment on that fact.

Well, consider, 10 miles and over down the coast, we found a great deposit of mud just off the mouth of the river, and after waiting eight hours managed to get over the bar without being stuck but three times—and the tug drew 3 feet.

Then 8 miles up a slimy, winding bayou of a river until at 4 a. m. we struck a piece of spongy ground about 20 feet above the sea level. Now you have us located. It rains continually in a way that would have made Noah marvel. And trails, if you can find one, make the "Slough of Despond" seem like an asphalt pavement. Now, this little spot of black sogginess is a reconcentrado pen, with a dead line outside, beyond which everything living is shot.

This corpse-carcass stench wafted in and combined with some lovely municipal odors besides makes it slightly unpleasant here.

Upon arrival I found 30 cases of smallpox and average fresh ones of 5 a day, which practically have to be turned out to die. At nightfall clouds of huge vampire bats softly swirl out on their orgies over the dead.

Mosquitoes work in relays and keep up their pestering day and night. There is a pleasing uncertainty as to your being boloed before morning or being cut down in the long grass or sniped at. It seems way out of the world without a sight of the sea—in fact, more like some suburb of hell.

If that is a suburb of hell, Mr. President, what must hell be! That is a description that applies to more than one, and if you would order an investigation of what has occurred in the Philippine Islands it would, I have no doubt, be found that that was a picture of many. Talk about the hardships of the American soldiers! We do not know anything about them unless we go there and see what they are going through with; and I say it is doubly an outrage if men who are subjected to lives of that kind have to be confused and contaminated with the wretches who have dishonored their uniform in the perpetration of these atrocities of which we hear every day; and it is for those honorable men whom I know that I have raised my voice to-day in condemnation of the perpetrators of these outrages, in order that the innocent may be vindicated and justified and relieved from the imputation of participation in acts that would disgrace not only barbarians, but the very devils in hell themselves.

I say I read that in order that we might have some idea of what a reconcentrado camp is, and the picture of one is in the main feature doubtless a picture of all, with, probably, the smallpox in one case but not in another, with a healthy camp in one case and not in another, etc.; but it is a picture of all as to being a limited zone of life surrounded by a wide area of absolute death and desolation.

Am I right or am I wrong in saying that the question of the responsibility for the reconcentrado camps is infinitely greater and more serious than the question of the responsibility for these outrages of the water torture or any other kind of torture? In one case it is the act of the unlicensed minority, for whom we disclaim all responsibility except that we have given them the opportunity to do these things, and for whom we can disclaim any further responsibility unless we continue by the pursuance of this policy to give to this element the opportunity for the perpetration of these atrocities.

But when we come to the reconcentrado camps, when we come to plead at the bar of the great conscience of the civilized world, we can not put in any such plea. We can not plead that this was without authority; we can not plead that this was done by some straggler or some indiscreet young lieutenant and a detachment under his command. We are obliged to plead that we did it, and then put in a plea of justification, if we can find it.

It is not pleasant, Mr. President, to talk about these things. I said that when I began. God knows there is not a word that I utter that does not give me pain, and which does not bring a tinge of shame to my cheek. If there were no duty connected with it, I would rather cover it all up out of sight. I would rather, Mr. President, like the dutiful son told of in the Bible story, walk backward that I might not see the nakedness, and cover with my own mantle the shame and the dishonor. But, Mr. President, there is a duty in the matter, a high duty, a duty not to be ignored. What is the duty? The duty is not in the wholesale condemnation of the Army; the duty is not in the justification of those who perpetrate these wrongs; the duty is in the denial of them as the acts of the Army and the denunciation of them as the acts of the minority, so far as the water torture is concerned—the exposure and condemnation of the guilty and the vindication of the innocent.

What is the duty as to the reconcentrado camps? I know of no duty that we can perform relative to them except that of presenting a lesson to the people of the United States in order that they may learn, not only now, but as to all time in the past and for all time in the future, that the domination of inferior races, the holding of weak and unwilling people in unwilling bondage by the terror of the sword has been invariably and will be invariably the history of successive chapters, all of which are chapters of blood.

I have but one purpose, one desire, in saying a single word upon this painful subject, and that is the hope that some feeble word spoken by me may bring the American people to a realization of that fact, that it may be brought to their serious consideration whether or not they will halt on this path of blood or return to their legitimate sphere as a peaceful, a civilized, and a humanitarian people.

Mr. President, there is but one answer to be made to the fact that this reconcentrado business, with all its unutterable and unspeakable horrors, the magnitude and extent and number of which will never be known, for the mountain fastnesses and the jungles will never give up their secrets—there is but one answer to be made, and the American people should look that answer square in the face; and that answer is, it was necessary to accomplish the work which their Army was assigned to do. If it was not necessary in order to accomplish the work, they were acts of unparalleled and unmitigated barbarity, the condemnation of which can not be uttered too loudly or pronounced too emphatically and severely.

But, Mr. President, that is the answer that will be made, that the task assigned them in that difficult country under difficult conditions, with people difficult of identification, and with men who are soldiers and amigos on the same day, with secret contributions, with a people, as stated by the officers of the Army, united, practically unanimous, in their support of what we call insurrection—there is no way to reach those men except by reconcentrado camps.

I say, "what we call insurrection." It is properly called insurrection, because whether we ever had title to that country or not at one time, we have, according to all the laws of nations now a title—
